WON BY LOYALTY.

The Tale of a Diamond Robbery.

From the New York News.

At that time I was engaged (and very pleased to be) to a most enigmatical young person. She spoke rarely and in a way always a little mysteriously, making voluntary secrets of a hundred little actions of life, and loving solitude in an alarming manner.

All this was off-set by eyes so beautiful, by a coloring so marvellous, by an expression so divine, that I had not the courage to reflect on the singularity of her character. I loved her, and I often passed hours of the night sitting before her doorstep, simply dreaming that she lived here," and meditating on her presence as does the believer on the transubstantiation.

I did not know, in the first place, whether she loved me or not; she always refused to answer that question, referring to the wishes of her parents and her confidence in their wisdom. If I insisted, she generally ended by saying, "that she knew nothing about it, but that she felt no antipathy toward me, and that, according to her ideas, was enough to decide a young girl on marriage!" In vain I supplicated, in vain I tried to animate this enigmatical being; she remained as distant as the manner in which she loved, as unknown as she was dominating.

One evening as I was dreaming a little sadly of these things a commotion was heard in the house, I returned to the salon, where everything was in disorder, my hosts were distressed, their friends embarrassed and troubled and old Mme. Laroche horribly pale and trembling.

"What in the world has happened?" I asked. They explained incoherently that Mme. Laroche's diamonds were stolen—old family diamonds of great value. All the servants had been summoned into an adjoining room—in short, a formal search was to be instituted. An old gentleman, M. Coppe, had been unanimously selected to direct this investigation just as I was entering, and his first proposition was that everyone should submit or, rather, offer himself to be searched. Although the thing was rather offensive, no one protested, and it was decided that, after the servants, each person present should be examined.

To tell the truth, all this seemed of small importance beside my personal cares; and, with several others, I awaited the end of the adventure, while M. Coppe, his two witnesses and our host, began the inspection of the domestics.

Very soon I fell again into my meditation, my eyes fixed on the fireplace as though there were a fire, when suddenly I felt a light touch on my elbow. I raised my head with a start, to see my fiancee looking at me most beseechingly. We were alone near the fireside and could talk in low tones without being overheard. She murmured very low:

"If you love me, arrange that they search you first; then try to be near me, and, without being seen, try to conceal the object that I shall pass you from behind."

My blood ran cold. This annoying incident became terrible, filling me with the most passionate trouble. I looked at the girl in agony, but forced myself to smile, and whispered:

"It shall be as you wish!"

My knees trembled, my mouth was hot and dry. The feeling that overwhelmed me was inexpressible. It was a strange mingling of bitterness and pleasure, that my loved one should be weak to such a degree. I forced myself to have a sort of disdainful pity, and in reality love beat ardent, strong, stern in my breast. I understood, in a flash, how beauty could become divine above baseness of soul, and how one could respect it even in dishonor—and a hundred other things in which were confused fervent love, devotion without limit, a desire noble and perverse.

Jeanne had thanked me with hardly perceptible movement of the lips; she stood by the wall with an air of indifference and pride!

"They are very long about it," she said sternly. M. Coppe is a man of method," someone replied. And a silence followed which told more and more on one's nerves, for even the waiting in a peaceful frame of mind finished by disturbing and emptying the brain, like a pump. However, the moment arrived when the searching of the servants ended, the door opened, disclosing our host, the two witnesses, and the old gentleman.

My heart beat furiously. I felt myself becoming terribly pale, but, concealing my agitation and steadying my voice, I asked to be searched first.

M. Coppe smiled at what he considered the whim of a young man, and proceeded methodically to my examination. I blushed. I became pale without anyone finding that peculiar under the circumstances. When it was over I made two or three steps backward and I found myself near Jeanne. She lowered her fan and handed me something with a coolness that was only equalled by my calmness in seizing the object and placing it in a pocket of my coat. After which I leant against the fireplace, being now merely a witness and above all suspicion.

M. Coppe's search was unproductive of results. There remained nothing to do but to visit all the rooms and then inform the police.

Still my trouble of mind increased as I remained standing by the fire place. My brain was in a whirl, and I felt the crime weigh on me as though I were indeed the thief.

Jeanne at last came toward me with that undulating step of hers, and gave me a look of such passionate gratitude that it almost seemed to scorch me. Then in an imperative tone she said:

"Do you still love me?"

I did not hesitate. I replied firmly:

"Yes."

"In spite of all that I have done?"

"In spite of everything!"

"Will you marry me?"

She enveloped me with the same look still warmer and more lingering. I fully comprehended the power of woman, above all law, human or natural, drawn from the fountain-head and against which nothing ought to prevail.

I felt strangely happy in this equivocal adventure, and could not throw off this happiness for which I reproached myself and of which I was terribly ashamed.

As I was struggling with these contending emotions, exclamations were heard and I saw M. Coppe reappear holding a little box.

"We have the jewels and the guilty one!" he said very calmly.

I had only time to hear this much and to see the livid face of the valet—the guilty one—when I found that Jeanne was gently urging me out on the terrace where the shadows lay thickly. There I felt my head seized with two hands, while two pure lips were pressed to mine, as Jeanne murmured:

"The thief adores you! She has tricked you! To test your love she gave you her own jewel box!"

Too Cheerful.

Some one, somewhere, has said that "a pessimist is one who has been intimately acquainted with an optimist."

Many a woman is contented to go her way rejoicing, valuing her own sphere and what she finds in it, until by some accident of circumstances she comes in touch with what seems to her to be better things. Discontent is very apt to follow and make her look on the dark side of things that before showed no discontent whatever. Or at least showed nothing that she thought too bad for her to remedy with work and time.

To such natures as these a chance acquaintance, who is, perhaps, better circumstanced or understands a more interesting life and talks of herself and affairs in a sunny, too cheerful way, is really a misfortune.

So it is well to be too cheerful sometimes. What has generally, throughout time, been lauded a virtue may bring out in some cases woeful discontent and start up a pessimist all unawares.

Cheerfulness is all right in its place. But when it comes directly in contact with its opposite it better beware, and use all its tact not to be the cause of another, unhappiness.

Better than too much cheerfulness over one's own affairs is a little insight into the troubles of others, and a willingness to "help out" in them in as unostentatious a way as possible.

No man is perfect; no man lives who has not made a mistake. Mistakes are the mile-stones and markers in a man's life. Mistakes are the things that give us experience.

The man who tries to please everyone generally has a contempt for himself.

A willful waist is a woeful want to the fellow who would like to squeeze it.

Some people prefer to believe what they hear rather than what they see.

Magazine Notes.

APRIL COSMOPOLITAN.

The April Cosmopolitan is a carefully balanced magazine. It appeals to the individual tastes of the many, and the many tastes of the individual. There are 17 stories and articles—101 pictures. Chief place is given to a striking article on "The Americanization of the Canadian Northwest," written by William R. Stewart. Field-marshal Viscount Wolseley, K.P.; H. G. Wells, Henry Seton Merriman, Seumas MacManus, and several other well-known writers contribnte to this number of The Cosmopolitan, which is particularly remarkable for the variety of its fiction.

APRIL CENTURY.

Of high importance among the magazine articles of the month is "The Restoration of the White House," written for the April Century by Charles Moore, clerk of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, whose accounts of "The Improvement of Washington City" appeared in The Century for Febuary and March last year Mr. Moore tells in detail the story of the president's house, its first plans, its occasional remodeling, and all the design and accomplishment of the present restoration, an event full of interest to every American. In illustrating the article The Century has employed its best illustrative resources. The exterior drawings by Jules Guerin and the interior by Alfred Brennan, bring out the intention of the architects to a remarkable degree. The frontispiece of the number is a picture by Jules Guerin of the new East Entrance on the occasion of an evening reception. Mr. Brennan has made, among other pictures, double drawings of the new State Dining Room and of the new Blue Room. Miss Cecilia Beaux's portrait of Mrs. Roosevelt (with her daughter Ethel) is published for the first time.

APRIL ST. NICHOLAS.

G. W. Orton, who won the American cross-country championship in 1897, and who is the two-mile world's steeplechase champion, in the April St. Nicholas tells his young readers about "Training for Interscholastic Athletics," with some helpful points for instructors and parents as well. The article treats of improper training, sprinting, distance running, middle-distance running, the high hurdle, and the low hurdle; and the illustrations are from excellent photographs of Wadsley, champion of England at 220 yards; I. A. Horton, 600-yards American indoor champion; Trafford, Duffy, Tremeer and White ready for a start; the last lap of the one-mile English championship race, July 5, 1902; G. W. Orton winning the American cross-country championship in 1897; Kraenzlein taking a high hurdle and again going over a low hurdle. The same authority will follow this article with another in the May St. Nicholas on pole vaulting, throwing the hammer, broad-jumping, high-jumping and other timely athletic sports.

Wall Paper! Wall Paper!

I wish to call the attention of my friends and the public in general to the fact that I now am ready to show one of the ever exhibited in this county, bought direct from the factory, in full bundle lots, so you get it only from second hands, no two or three profits coming off it. Of course the consumer pays them all. Sam Jones says it takes a point per pup nine days to get his eyes open. I have known some people to get their's open in fifteen minutes in a wall paper deal. They thought it was two pieces instead of one, and the border they did not understand, &c. That is always their plea. Remember I am the only paper hanger in the county that carries a stock and don't have the expense of running a store therefore I have no opposition. Is you think I can't save you money, come and see me and bring size of your room, or send size by mail and I will tell you what your job will cost, and send samples and convince you that Gladhill's is the place to save twenty-five cents on a dollar on all Wall Papers.
