SERVING HIS SENTENCE.

:o:

Her memory gave a tiger-like spring, and she instantly knew that this man in the gray trousers and flannel shirt, with clean-shaven face—garb of disgrace—was Lynn Chappell, whom she had met and danced with four seasons before.

He looked up as she entered the office of the prison, and the recognition she read in his eyes was the flint by which her memory was struck.

The blood rushed to her face in shame and sorrow for him, but Leslie Werner didn't falter. She went up to him with extended hand as naturally as she would have done done if the meeting had occurred in a drawing room.

"You remember me, Mr. Chappell? We met at Mackinac a few summers ago."

"Indeed I remember you very well, Miss Werner," he said earnestly. "I am pleased to see you again."

She was about to reply that the meeting was mutual, when it occurred to her that she should not be glad to see him here.

"I am not going to be here long," she hastened to assure him. "I stopped off over a train to see Miss Effie Fulton, the warden's daughter."

Before he could reply the warden entered. He hesitated slightly and Leslie remembered that it was against the prison rules to introduce a convict or call him by name. The warden presented him, however, and Leslie was grateful to him for his consideration.

"I have met Mr. Chappell before. I was speaking with him when you came in."

Some one called to Chappell from the corridor, and with a bow to Leslie, he left the room just as Ned Fulton, the young son of the warden entered.

"Come on, Miss Werner. Effie is waiting for you to go through the prison."

"Ned, you saw that man who left the room as you came in," said Leslie to the boy, as they went to join his sister. "What is he in for?"

Ned hesitated.

"Let me see—he is No. 67. Forgery."

"Oh, dear!" she said in dismay. "Will he have to stay long?"

"No. He got a short sentence, and his good behaviour will get him time."

In these last four years Leslie had scarcely once recalled Lynn Chappell. He was handsome now, even in his coarse prison attire. One would know instantly he was different from the other convicts. Honor was surely written in his countenance. Maybe he was wrongly imprisoned.

When they made the rounds of the institution, and she saw the dark cells, the stuffy workshops, the coarse food and the evil faces of the inmates, her heart ached for Chappell. She was quite distrait during the day and glad when train time took her from this depressing place.

After a visit of four weeks to a relative, she returned to her home in the west.

"I have some good news for you, Leslie," said one of her friends on the night of her arrival. "There is a new man in town, and he's a howling swell."

"Well I am sure that is an event," laughed Leslie. "What is his name?"

"Lynn Chappell. He is from the east, and is establishing a branch office for his manufacturing company here."

By an effort Leslie kept her composure. Lynn Chappell here! He must have served a short sentence or have been pardoned. He had probably come to this far western city to start anew among strangers. Well, of course, she would not betray his secret, but it would be awkward and unpleasant to be the only one in his confidence. It does not take long for a man to establish himself socially in a small western town.

The evening of her arrival Leslie met Chappell. Instead of appearing confused by her presence he greeted her cordially, and asked for her unengaged dance. She was unprepared for this contingency and accepted. She was immediately besieged by her conscience in consequence of such acceptance.

Then she forgot everything save the pleasure of dancing with him. When the music stopped, he took her to a little curtained alcove, and she braced herself for the humiliating ordeal of hearing his confession and plea for silence. She was non-plussed when he began chatting of their summer at Mackinac and other trival matters.

Finally he asked her for another dance. She replied coldly that her dances were all engaged, and asked him to take her back to the ballroom. He looked very much disappointed.

She had felt sorry for him that day at the prison; now she felt only anger that he should keep silence and take it for granted she would overlook his record.

All Leslie's set had taken him up and seemed oblivious to any stain upon his character, but she refrained from inviting him to call, and the Werner home was the only one whose threshold he had not crossed.

Mr. Werner made his acquaintance, however, in a business way, and brought him home to dinner one evening. It chanced that Leslie was alone in the library with him for a few minutes while her father was called to the telephone.

"Miss Werner," said Chappell, in his quick, direct way, I feel like an intruder, for I know and regret that for some reason my presence is not agreeable to you. Your father insisted that I had no plausible excuse for not coming."

Her father's return to the room prevented her reply. Mrs. Werner was away and it developed upon Leslie to be the hostess, and she did not fail in her part. She was so agreeable throughout the dinner and during the evening that Lynn took heart.

"Miss Werner, I cannot express to you how I have enjoyed this evening. May I come again?" he asked in a low tone, as he bade her good night.

She looked him straight in the eyes.

"No," she said decidedly.

The color left his face and in his eyes came a hurt look that almost broke Leslie's heart. She lay awake that long night.

"What else could I say?" she asked herself. "I cannot receive him here, knowing what I do. If he is innocent, he should tell me so."

Under the various pretexts she stayed away from all festivities for the following week, and found she was more miserable than when she was constantly meeting him.

He was always in her thoughts. She explained this to herself by thinking it was the moral question of right and wrong that was troubling her—that it was a question of personality.

One day she received a letter from Effie Fulton, and after reading it she knew at last it was not a question of conscience after all. She faced the fact that she loved him—Lynn Chappell, a convict!

The letter stated that Mrs. Fulton and Ned were coming west to California and would stop at her home and would remain a day or two.

Her first thought was of Lynn. He must be warned. She wrote and dispatched a note to him, asking him to call at once on a matter of importance. He came in quick response.

"Mr. Chappell," she began abruptly, "I sent for you to tell you that Mrs Fulton and Ned will be here tomorrow."

"Indeed," he said, looking a little surprised. "I didn't know them very well, you know, but if there is anything I can do for them I shall be very glad to do it."

Was this sublime nerve or impudence? She was too staggered to reply at once, and he continued:

"Never mind them, now, Miss Werner. I am glad of this opportunity to tell you all that is and has been in my heart and thoughts."

At last it was coming, but long deferred!

"I liked you from the first moment I met you that summer, but you left there suddenly, and I did not know where you lived, even. When you came into the prison office that afternoon I was so overcome with pleasure and surprise at seeing you that I was tongue-tied. When I arrived I could hardly wait for your return. You came, but you were so changed in your manner to me—so repellant and cold! I have waited patiently, hoping your aversion was but a passing whim, for I love you, Leslie, with a love that your coldness cannot change. Is there something in me that is repellant to you, or have I unwittingly done something to offend you?"

She turned to him, her eyes full of tears.

"Oh, can't you see!" she cried. "I love you! Wait! There is something you must explain. Were you innocent of that crime?"

"What crime?" he repeated in amazement.

"Mr. Chappell, I saw you in prison clothes. Ned told me you were sentenced for forgery."

There was an awful moment of silence. Leslie's face was buried in her hands.

"Leslie," he said, his voice vibrant with feeling. "Look at me, Leslie—please!"

She looked into his eyes steadily.

"Leslie, I never committed forgery or any crime. I was never in prison. I spent a couple of days with the prison doctor. We had been duck hunting, and I fell in the lake. I had no other clothes with me, and the doctor, the warden and the rest of them were smaller than I. They rigged me out in a new prison uniform while my clothes were being pressed into shape. That forgery was a fairy tale of Ned's. He told me he had a good one on me."

"And to think," he said regretfully, "you have thought me a criminal all these weeks!"

"But," she argued, "it kept you in my thoughts as nothing else would have done."

If you have not got the right kind of chickens—good ones—get a good, thorough male and a few hens of the breed that you like best; then give them good care and they will raise you enough for your stock next year. Then sell off your old ones and raise better ones.
