SIDE ONE

London 18th March 1795.

My Dear Rivers

I think I promised in my last I would address you next, not including this; that I should write in a hurry — which I am now obliged to do — as I only last night received information from him Mr Brooks, ~~last night~~ that if I could send the papers &c, by 12 this day he could get them on board for me — He is my handy man in these matters — but for some months past he has been in trouble, & lately attending his Mother who is lately dead, & I fear I have not had constant information of ships sailing ~~information of ships sailing~~ The hurry I am writing in must by my excuse for all these blunders — I am vexed at the shortness of this notice, as I wished to have sent an exact statement of how matters stand between us, & sent the balance to each party, in some article I might think would be most acceptable — pray inform your Cousin of my intention, that she may not think me a rogue & agent — I am quite shocked to find upon looking at my memorandums &c so long since I have written I has in the country all the autumn for the recovery of my health which has greatly shook with all I had undergone in the last twelve months — It has so completely restored that I have gone through the severest Winter
