WELL DONE.

Sleep, happy people on field and wood—
Brush and creeper and herb and tree—
The Master judges thy off'ring good
And sends his steward to care for thee.
Doff thy festival garb of gold—
Plum and saffron and glowing red—
Winter hastens adown the wold
To tuck thee warm in thy waiting bed.

Sweet thy dreams as the winds rush by
And vainly pluck at thy coverlet,
And streams are fettered, and chill the sky,
And town and country are frost beset.
Dreams full thronged with the breeze's tale,
The bee's bassoon and the ring-dove's call;
With vista of meadow and hill and vale
From bursting spring to the brimming fall.

Sleep, happy people, where all is still
Save the crow's hoarse caw and the squirrel's bark;
The sun swings low o'er the leafless hill
And short grows the moment from dawn to dark.
Sleep, tis the Master who bids thee rest
And holds thee fast in his loving ken,
Till the doors fly open at his behest
And April summons to work again.
—E. L. Sabin, in Woman's Home Companion.

The Lucky Girl.

'Of course I shall be the one. I'm oldest,' said Edith.

'No, I shall, because you went away last, and I didn't,' said Ruth.

'I need a change for my health,' said Anna, with a drawn-down mouth that might truly be the sign of pain, but with rosy cheeks which could be the sign only of a very healthy girl.

'Whoever goes,' said Mrs. Stone, 'will have not only the visit, but the new clothes.'

'Then it will have to be me, because I haven't a thing left over from last year, and must have new clothes anyway,' said Edith.

'I think I might be the one,' said Anna, 'for I have a new Winter suit all ready.

'Which fits me as well as you, and could be borrowed,' added Ruth.

'Children! children!' cried Mrs. Stone, in despair. 'What would Aunt Nell say if she were to hear you quarrelling so over her invitation? She writes, 'I love all three of my nieces so much that I don't know which one I want to visit me next, so I will leave it for them to decide. Send along the girl who needs the change, and I promise her as nice a time as I know how to give.' '

But, instead of filling them with contrition, this reading of the letter made their desire to go all the stronger.

'Think of the sleigh rides behind the gray pair, all nestled down in those soft black furs!' said Anna; with a sigh, drawing the folds of an afghan about her, and half closing her eyes.

'I presume you hear the jingling of the sleigh-bells now,' said Ruth. 'A person with such a vivid imagination as you've got doesn't need to go away to enjoy things.'

'Well, mother,' said Edith, with a very grown-up air, 'I think somebody ought to go who will do credit to the family, and, of course, I've been out more and know how to act in society better than these children.'

'These children!' screamed Ruth and Anna, in a derisive chorus; but Mrs. Stone held up her finger with a warning gesture, and then, to the surprise of all, she buried her face in her hands, and sobbed—Yes, mother was crying!

The three girls looked at each other in dismay. 'Mother!' cried Edith, gently, 'what have we done?'

'I am so tired of it all,' burst out the sobbing woman. 'It has been so ever since your father died. Things no sooner get to running smoothly than there is a great fuss over who shall have a new dress, or whose boots are the shabbiest, or who shall go on the picnic? When there are three children there ought to be money enough to divide by three, not by one. I can't decide for you any more. You must choose some way yourself.'

The slow tears ran down her cheeks. Edith noticed how pale and wrinkled it was. There used to be color there when the father was alive. And what a shabby dress! 'Mother, I've decided who shall go, and it's not myself. Will you all consent? And, mother dear, will you let me do all the contriving about clothes and packing, so that you needn't have a thing to decide about it till the day comes to go?'

Mrs Stone wiped away the tears. 'I am very much ashamed,' she said. 'Of course I'll help get anyone of you ready. It was the disputing that troubled me.'

'Just this once, let me, mother,' said Edith. 'It will do me good, truly.'

So Mrs. Stone consented, and the two younger girls were borne away to Edith's room. 'Which of us is it?' asked Ruth.

'Neither,' said Edith.

'Why, Edith Stone,' said Anna; 'you selfish old thing, to choose yourself.'

'I didn't said Edith. 'It's—it's—mother!'

'Mother!' echoed Ruth.

'Why, she wasn't even asked,' said Anna.

'No, but Aunt Nell would rather have her than all three of us put together, if she had any idea she'd come.' 'Girls,' and Edith's voice trembled, 'the money has been divided into three parts when it ought to have been four. Does mother ever have a new dress? Does she ever go to a picnic or trolley riding? Do we choose her to have the extra orange or the Christmas present that's not marked for anybody? No, sir! We're selfish old pigs, that's what we are.'

'But will she go?' said Anna.

'She'll have to,' said Edith. 'Ruth, you run straight down to Marcy's and say that we've decided to change the blue suit for a black one. Anna hasn't worn it, and there was a lovely plain black for the same price. You don't mind, do you, Anna?'

'I'll wear my old one till it falls off,' said that young woman, 'and imagine it's stylish,' with a wink at Ruth.

'Her bonnet is all right, and how thankful I am my new silk waist is a plain black one, and too large. It will just fit mother.'

'And I'll get boots for her instead of skates for me,' said Ruth, 'and let her choose any of my stocks she likes, and—and she may take my new belt buckle, if she'll be very careful of it.'

A note was dispatched to Aunt Nell, and the loving planning went on, till the day for the visit came, and the mother was still in ignorance. She had thought it wise to let Edith arrange things this time, and had not tried to solve the mystery.

At ten o'clock the three girls stood before her. 'In one hour,' began Edith, 'the expressman stops at this house for the trunk of the one who is to visit Aunt Nell.'

'Which is no evidence, as the same trunk would go, whichever person went,' put in Anna.

'That trunk is now packed,' said Edith.

'And the contents not to be poked over or criticised by the traveler, said Ruth. 'And all lent articles are to be considered the person's own.'

'The ticket is bought,' said Anna.

'The person's pocketbook properly filled, with her name and address within in case of accident,' said Ruth.

'And the lucky girl is—?' smiled the mother.

'Mother!' cried three voices in chorus.

And in telling about it all to Aunt Nell, Mrs. Stone said that if those artful daughters of hers had given her longer than one hour to think of it, she would have decided not to come; and that she was glad they hadn't!—From the Churchman.

Wiping Out The Forests.

'In 20 years the timber supply in the United States, on government reserves and private holdings, at the present rate of cutting will be exhausted, although it is possible that the growth of that period might extend the arrival of the famine another five years.' This announcement was made today by Gifford Pinchot, the Government forester, who returned Nov. 1, 1907, from a six month inspection trip, on which he traveled 10,000 miles.

In sounding his warning Mr. Pinchot urged that the danger of the situation should not be underestimated. He said that the United States uses more timber per capita than any other country, and that every man, woman and child would be affected. He decried the policy of discounting the future of the country by failure to protect the natural resources and he advises everyone who has not already done so to read President Roosevelt's speech at Memphis on this general subject,

About one-fifth of the forest area of the country is in government reserves, but Mr. Pinchot called attention to the fact that as privately owned timber lands are better than the government reserves, as a general rule, the government does not control one-fifth of the timber supply. The Forest Service will ask Congress for more money and more men in order to extend the service and will push the work of reforesting the denuded timber lands. Mr. Pinchot says, however, that it is utterly beyond the possibility of the service to meet the the situation and prevent serious trouble. One hope entertained is the Appalachian forest and an effort will be made to protect this and promote the growth there.

A scheme advocated by the state forester of California is being watched with a great deal of interest. Under the police powers of the state the forester is endeavoring to protect the water sheds and prevent private owners from devastating these lands in such manner as will injure irrigation of lands below. If this plan works well, the government forester believes it will be taken up in other states, and the federal authorities will be aided greatly by the co-operation. In speaking of the protection of the natural resources, Mr. Pinchot said that there is a changing sentiment throughout the country, and that people are beginning to see that the right to use such resources does not carry with it the right to destroy them. The forest service will make additional efforts to educate the people along this line.

Mr. Pinchot produced figures to show that at the present increase in the value of timber land the owners of such land are making more money by letting the timber develop than they would by cutting it, marketing it and putting out the proceeds at interest.

President Roosevelt expects to call a conference in Washington shortly of governors of States and experts in the study of natural resources. The conference will be for the purpose of developing sentiment in favor of the administration's policy of looking into the future in the matter of conserving the natural resources, such as timber, coal, oil and gas, and the various minerals. It is believed by administration officials that when the people realize that the increase in lumber prices which began in 1900, and has continned rapidly since that time, was based not on actual shortage of supply, but upon the fact that the owners of private tracts of timber land were merely looking into the future, the government policy will be indorsed without question.
