Fairfield's Blood Tonic & Regulator for Horses Only.
Fairfield's Blood Tonic & Flesh Producer for Hogs Only.
Fairfield's BloodTonic & Milk Producer for Cattle Only.
Fairfield's Blood Tonic and & Egg Producer for Poultry Only.

They are not Cure-Alls.

Fairfields are separate Blood Tonics compounded to meet the peculiar requirements of the digestive system of each kind of animal (individually). You feed a cow for her milk producing qualities and the horse for his muscle and general condition. A cow has four stomachs, a horse but one. Isn't it reasonable that what is the best for one could not be the best for the other? This is also true in the case of the hog which is fed for meat and fat. You feed your poultry for egg production. Any preparation professing to be equally well suited to two or more kinds of animals must for its own safety omit from its formula some ingredient of greatest value to each kind of animal which renders it of little or no value to any.

Best and Least Expensive.

Fairfields Blood Tonics cost much less than the ordinary cure-all preparation, because of the highly concentrated doses. There is no cheap filler used in any of the Fairfield preparations such as is practised by many unscrupulous manufacturers for which you are charged high prices for the value you receive.

$100,000.00 to make Perfect Blood Tonics.

Fairfield's Tonics are Blood Foods and purifiers, the most helpful to your stock and poultry. More than One Hundred Thousand Dollars have been expended in making Fairfield's Blood Tonics the most perfect in the world; Not stock foods they are tonics in highly concentrated form (powders) given in smallest doses. They are mixed in with the regular food ration.

You Know Only too Well.

This is the season of the year when the horse needs a tonic of merit. He has been in the stable all winter and has not been able to get the succulent grasses and herbs that nature intended. He has been fed on dry cured feeds which have been robbed of the succulent matter and nutrition by the drying process. In most dried feed there are worms. Veterinarians will tell you that four out of every five horses are troubled with worms in the spring and that they should be removed. Fairfield's Blood Tonic for horses ONLY is the best known remedy, perfectly harmless, an appetizer, blood purifier and worm exterminator. We will mail you valuable information on stock and poultry, upon receipt of the coupon.

If you wish to know what the Fairfield Blood Tonics will do please send us this coupon today. It will convince you what telling results they produce.

LETTER FROM ABROAD

How Neapolitans Impose on Foreigners—Even a New York "Drummer" Flim-flammed—Why Naples is Losing Popularity—Vesuvius Inactive and Naples Mourns.

Special to the American Sentinel.
(By W. B. Seabrook.)

Naples, Italy.

In the cross-roads grocery stores of Arkansas and Missouri, it is often said of a vicious mule that "he can kick the molasses out of a ginger cake.' The young sneak thieves of Naples, however, surpass this proverbial performance—they can steal the sugar from a cup of coffee! I've seen them do it, more than once, and on each occasion my admiration for their dexterity increases. They usually operate in front of the crowded cafes of the Galleria Umberto Primo, where the tables are placed in the open air, upon the border of the promenades.

Having encountered an acquaintance while strolling one evening in the gallery, I accepted his invitation to sit down for a chat over a cup of coffee; the waiter brought the coffee service upon a tray, with two or three lumps of sugar laid in the saucers at the side of each empty cup, and then withdrew, leaving us to serve ourselves; at that moment my companion was calling my attention to a newspaper dispatch announcing the tragic death of M. Catulle Mendes, the French playwright, and as we were both bent over the journal, a ragged urchin of 8 or 10 years, who had evidently been crouching beneath the very table at which we were seated., bobbed up like a jack-in-the box, darted forward a grimy paw with lightning rapidity, and before we could recover from our astonishment had disappeared with the sugar from both saucers! When we called the waiter, he uttered a patient sigh of comprehension and brought a second supply of sugar. He was pestered night and day by the little vagabonds, he said; occasionally one of them was caught and flogged or sent to the reformatory, but these measures had not put a stop to the nuisance; every big cafe in Naples, he declared, was subjected to the same kind of pillage.

It seems that the pilfering of sugar is a regular trade, a means of livelihood for hundreds of street gamins, who hoard away their booty lump by lump, and after collecting a half pound or more dispose of it to the lower class restaurants along the waterfront, sometimes selling it, sometimes bartering it for food. The price of sugar (and of salt) is excessively high in Italy because of special taxes, and the proprietors of small eating-houses naturally encourage the young rascals, who supply them at reduced rates. These details I learned from the exasperated waiter. The little thieves are so stealthy and move so silently on their bare feet that they sometimes manage to creep under a table, filch the sugar and escape without being seen at all—a sleight of hand performance which occasionally gives rise to amusing situations when the victim is a stranger, unacquainted with the practice. The ragamuffins nearly always pick out tourists and foreigners, knowing from experience that they are the easiest marks.

But such tricks are not confined exclusively to street gamins, or even to the poor lower classes. One of the most aggravating and most characteristic qualities of the typical Neapolitan, even the well-to-do tradesman, is his passion for petty thievery, his constant planning of mean little schemes to gain one or two dishonest pennies. I can pity the wretch whom hunger drives to theft, I can feel a certain admiration for the bold highway robber, who shoves a gun-barrel in my face, and even for the crooked financier, whose shady transactions involve fortunes, but these thriving, prosperous Neapolitan merchants who are ever ready to sell their souls for a miserable copper soldo, fill me with contempt.

I want to relate a case or two in point.

The other morning, while purchasing provisions for a tramping excursion in the country, I entered an establishment on the Via Toledo—a big store, resplendent with plate glass and marble furnishings—and asked a clerk for ten cents worth of black olives. It happened that one of the proprietors heard my modest request. Fearing that his employee might so far forget himself as to treat a stranger honestly, and judging from my imperfect accent that I would not understand his words, he edged up to the clerk and whispered,

"Give him only nine cents worth!"

HOW STRANGERS ARE VICTIMIZED.

On another occasion it was a tobacconist who gave me in change for five lire a handful of nickel pieces, each representing five soldi. It was the first money of that kind I had encountered in Italy, but I saw that it was bona fide, uncounterfeited coin, so I accepted it without protest. When I got back to the hotel, I learned that the coins were of an old mintage, had been formally withdrawn from circulation long ago, and were consequently without value. Of course it was useless to return to the tobacco merchant, but I went back to see him, prompted simply by curiosity to know what kind of a face he would put upon the matter. Only ten minutes had elapsed, but he was not at all embarrassed and swore by St. January, by the Blessed Virgin, by his father's bones and his mother's honor, that he had never laid eyes on me before.

Every day I meet Americans, who have suffered like or worse impositions. One of them, as sharp a New England "drummer" as I have ever met, had been short-changed out of twenty lire by a post-office clerk: a New Yorker, who had bought a diamond from a jewelry firm recommended in all the guide-books, lost forty odd dollars by the transaction. The diamond was O. K. but in making change the clerk had unloaded upon him a number of counterfeit gold coins. Another of my compatriots wanted to have a suit cleaned and confided the commission to a hotel porter: next morning the suit came back, the bill was $1.50 and the porter required a tip in addition; a week afterward the American carried another suit directly to the cleaner, was charged only fifty cents, and learned that the same charge had been made for the first suit. The porter had presented a forged bill. It is the same old story here, season in and season out. During almost a half year spent in France, including an extended sojourn in Paris, I recollect having dealt with only two or three dishonest people, but in Italy not a single day passes that I do not encounter a score. I believe there are plenty of honest and noble Italians in Tuscany and the Piedmont, but there seem to be few here in the South.

AN OFF YEAR FOR TOURISTS.

I am told that this is an off year for tourists—certainly there are not so many of them at Naples as at Nice and Monte Carlo. Thousands of English and Germans have been deterred from their annual visits by the Sicilian catastrophe, not that they fear earthquakes or infections away off up here in Naples, but most of the habitual travelers have become accustomed to include Sicily in their Italian itinerary, and seeing half their trip spoiled have decided to give it up entirely, many of them packing off to Egypt instead.

The inactivity of Vesuvius, which amounts almost to temporary extinction, has also hurt Naples as a tourist city.

The red flames formerly visible by night and the wreathing clouds of smoke by day made the volcano the chief attraction of Naples in the eyes of the average stranger, and every season the desire to see the phenomenon drew southward many voyagers, whose itinerary would otherwise have ended at Rome. But, since the eruption which occurred four years ago, not a single glimmer of fire is to be seen even on the clearest night, and only a thin, ill-defined wisp of smoke by day. Of course it is still Vesuvius, still the mountain which destroyed Pompeii, still the most famous volcano in the world, but it has lost, at least for the time being, more than half its grandeur.

The attitude of the Neapolitan population toward Vesuvius is curious. With the ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii always beneath their eyes, like a skeleton at the feast, a lugubrious reminder of the subterranean forces which slumber for centuries and then awaken to spread death and destruction; with three cent Calabrian cataclysm to warn them of the instability of the earth in all the volcanic belt of southern Italy, one might suppose that the Neapolitans would fear Vesuvius as a dying sinner fears the devil; would rejoice in the extinction of its fires and become half crazed with anxiety every time the volcano began to show signs of renewed activity. No notion, however, could be wider of the mark. They look upon Vesuvius as a sort of gigantic milk-cow. When a "sure-enough" cow gives lots of milk, the dairyman's pails are well-filled and he is happy. When this Vesuvius cow gives lots of fire and smoke, the tourists flock from all lands to see the marvel, and the Neapolitans' cash drawers are filled to overflowing by a stream of gold. Now the milk-cow has gone dry, and Naples mourns.

Recent hotel statistics show that Naples is decreasing in popularity as a tourist resort and the fact is generally attributed to the above mentioned cause; but the city's richly deserved reputation for mendicity and dishonesty is doubtless commencing to have its effect, and after spending several weeks in this, the most pictureque and beautiful seaport of the world, I begin to understand why all travelers want to see Naples, and why few want to remain here longer than a day.

Coopers Guilty in Second Degree.

The jury in the trial of Col. Duncan Brown Cooper, his son Robin Jones Cooper, and John D. Sharp, for the murder of Ex-United States Senator Edward W. Carmack, at Nashville, Tenn., rendered a verdict of "not guilty," as to Sharp, on Friday last, and the foreman said they were "hopelessly tied up" as to the Coopers. Counsel for the Coopers claimed a mistrial, but Judge Hart refused to discharge the panel and sent the jurors back to their room for further deliberation. On Saturday they agreed upon and rendered a verdict finding the Coopers guilty of murder in the second degree and fixed the penalty at twenty years imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Counsel for the accused at once interposed the objection that the statement made on Friday, that the jury was "hopelessly tied," was tantamount to final action, and moved that the result be recorded as a mistrial. The motion was overruled by Judge Hart and then a motion for a new trial was made. This was also denied, whereupon notice of an appeal was entered. The Cooper, were then released from custody upon giving bail, each in the sum of $25,000. It is said that pending the decision of the Appellate Court they will go abroad and travel in foreign countries.

No case has ever excited greater interest in the minds of the people of Tennesse and the whole country has looked on in the hope, but with little expectation, that justice would be meted out to the murderers. It is said that the jury at first stood 6 for conviction of murder in the first degree, 5 for murder in the second degree and 1 for acquittal. The one juror held out until the last moment, but when the jurors who favored a verdict in the first degree consented to a finding in the second degree, finally yielded, with the result stated.

Ex-President Roosevelt and his son Kermit sailed from New York, on Tuesday, on the steamship Hamburg, for Europe, enroute for Africa, where they will engage in hunting wild animals. Their baggage was tagged for Naples, Italy. Mr. Roosevelt will not engage in the hunt merely for the sport but will seek to add to the list of the known fauna of the Dark Continent by discovering animals of which the world outside of the African wilds has no knowledge. He will, of course, hunt such savage brutes as lions, tigers, leopards, and also such larger game as elephants, hippopotamis, the rhinoceros &c. His parting with his family was pathetic, but he goes abroad full of the hope of adding to his laurels as a famous hunter and smiles at the fears of those who predict that he will encounter great perils and dangers. The people of the United States will be glad to see him return in triumph from the hunt, with many trophies of his skill as another Nimrod, a "mighty hunter."
