Lot No. 1. This lot contains 5¼ acres of land, more or less, and has a frontage of 402 feet on the county road leading from Gross' Mill to Hampstead, and an average depth of 625 feet, and is the first lot to the right of said county road, going from Hampstead.

Lot No. 2. This lot contains 6 acres, 3 roods and 7 perches of land, more or less, and has a frontage of 412½ feet on the above mentioned county road, and an average depth of about 780 feet, and this lot adjoins Lot No. 1, and has running water on it.

Lot No. 3. This lot contains 10 acres and 4 perches of land, more or less. This lot adjoins Lot No. 2, and has a frontage of 429 feet on the above mentioned county road, and an average depth of about 1000 feet. LETTER FROM ABROAD.

Special to the American Sentinel.

(By W. B. Seabrook.)

A City Without Horses or Carriages—The Fisherman's Story of the Legend of the Glories of the City Beneath the Sea.

Venice, Italy.—People who stay here long enough to get over the startling novelty of a city whose streets are water, find the atmosphere of Venice peculiarly soothing and restful; the real secret of the city's charm, the thing that makes it so different from any other spot on earth, is the complete absence of WHEELS. The wheel is typical both in fact and in poetic symbolism of the eternal whirl and grind of the modern strenuous life: the nerve-racking roar and rumble of New York's crowded streets result, materially speaking, from but one thing—wheels; the great factory towns with their whirr and clatter are but gigantic machines formed of wheels upon wheels, with slaving populations caught between the cogs and doomed to have their lives ground out in the ceaseless round of toil; the noisy commerce of the world rolls everlastingly on wheels, and so dependent upon them is the mechanism of our hurrying civilization that if the geometric conception of the circle were eliminated from human invention, the world would be paralyzed, the world would be at peace. Venice is the wheel-less city, the only one on earth: here whirl, rumble and clatter are unknown, and the stone-paved streets, even when thronged with people, are almost as silent as the canals.

The Venetian mother who sends her six-year-old young hopeful around the corner to the grocer's for a pound of sugar or a bar of soap, is never tortured, if the youngster happens to linger on the way, by visions of her darling child crushed beneath a dray, run over by an automobile, or knocked down by a bicycle; it is true that the youngster aforesaid would not have sense enough to get out of the way of a wagon if he saw it coming—he would be too stupefied by the strange sight—but he will never see one so long as he lives in Venice, not even a pony-cart or a velocipede, so his chances of being crippled are nil, and his fond mama rests tranquil in the assurance that if he doesn't tumble in the canal and drown, he will grow up to be a hale and able-bodied loafer, with all his bones intact.

There are more streets than canals in Venice, but all "hauling" is done along the waterways, and the other thoroughfares are reserved exclusively for pedestrians; in fact most of them are so narrow that the smallest cart would get jammed between the houses and block the passage.

Any flight of marble steps built down into the water is somehow suggestive of clandestine love-meetings and treacherous dagger-thrusts, and when such a stairway happens to be in Venice, when it leads from the dark hallway of a palace to the darker waters of a canal, its power to conjure up scenes of tragic romance is infinite. The wavelets still break and ripple on these steps as the Adriatic tide rolls in, still lap the marble in the moonlight when the tide is low, just as they did in the days of Desdemona and Othello, just as they did in the days when the Doge was rowed out to wed the sea, in his golden boat, the Bucintore. But it is not of Venice with her romantic and historic legends that I love to think as I sit beneath the arch of some old palace doorway and watch the wavelets rippling at my feet, the steps do not descend simply to the water's edge and stop there, they sink beneath the waves, the first couple of gradations gleaming white through the transparent green, the lower ones gradually becoming less and less distinct until they disappear, until they disappear in such a beckoning, mysterious manner that a strange temptation sometimes surges upon me to walk straight before me down that marble stairway, down through that translucent veil of liquid green, down, down, down, until my eyes behold the nameless hidden wonders whither I know such steps can only lead.

One day I asked an old fisherman how deep they went, and where they ended; and with a strange light in his half-closed eyes the old man crossed himself and told me I might follow any one of the marble stairways with the certainty that it would lead me to a city fairer far than Venice, a city built beneath the waves, a city buried in the sea, where the palaces were coral, where the streets are paved with pearls; he had seen its gilded domes, he said, of evenings as he was sailing homeward while the sunset glow was on the water, and I knew his words were true because I too had sometimes heard its church-bells tolling, as I lay day-dreaming on the deserted beach of some grassy island in the lagoon.

It must be a very large city, for the old fisherman tells me that its population is made up of all the departed thousands who once lived in Venice; there reside Bassanio and Portia, there still sits the Council of the Ten, there live Desdemona and the Doges. I know it is a very beautiful city, for of all the numberless hosts who have descended beneath the waves, not one has ever returned. Do they ever wish to return? Do they sometimes moan because the water is so deep and dark and cold? Do they sometimes long for the warm sunlight? I cannot tell. And that is why I do not dare descend the stairway, that is why just at the moment when I strain my eyes for a clearer vision of the gilded domes and fairy palaces, I draw back shuddering from the brink and seem to see horrible clammy hands striving in vain to clutch the slippery marble steps.

BIG COMET IS COMING

"Halley's" Will Light Up The Entire Heavens.

THE STAR LAST SEEN IN 1835

Rushing Toward The World Now At The Rate Of A Million Miles A Day.

From the Baltimore Sun.

Washington, Aug. 22.—"If you live until next spring you are going to witness one of the most magnificent sights the heavens have ever disclosed before your eyes," said a well-known member of the astronomical force at the United States Naval Observatory this afternoon to the correspondennt of The Sun. "Halley's comet comes only once in a lifetime, and many persons are born, live and die without ever catching a glimpse of its marvelous dash of fire across the skies. It was last seen in 1835, and few persons now alive can say they have ever witnessed it."

The astronomical world is now on the watch, and huge refracting and reflecting telescopes are trained upon the heavens from many points on the earth in a common effort to locate the comet, which is approaching the earth at a terrific rate. There is a friendly rivalry to see which will be the first to pick up the comet with their mirrors.

The comet in its full refulgence is not due until 1910, but by spring it will probably be near enough to be visible by naked eye. In the past it has spanned the heavens almost from horizon to horizon, covering as much as 100 degrees of celestial territory, and standing out like a great living thing of fire. It is now somewhere off in space, but not yet visible to astronomers. They confidently expect someone to pick it up before the end of 1909, and after that it will increase in splendor and size until it reaches its nearest approach to the earth, sometime next spring, after which it will disappear, not to be seen again in 75 years.

"Halley's comet has been visiting the vicinity of the earth ever since 500 or 600 years before Christ," said the astronomer. "Halley was an Englishman, whose name was given to the comet because he was the first to announce that this particular comet came near the earth at regular periods once every 75 years. He went over the records and by a series of computations found that what had previously been regarded as a series of different comets, was nothing more than the same comet, and that this, the most magnificent of them all, came around regularly once every 75 years. That was during the latter part of the eighteenth century, and Halley announced that this comet would next appear in 1835. He never lived to see it come, but his successors found that his prediction came true.

"The comet's seventy-five-year journey will bring it toward us near enough for it to be seen early in 1910. It has never before been photographed, because photography was invented after 1835. Neither has the spectroscope been used upon this comet, this being another new invention. The telegraph is another facility not available in 1835, and there were at that time nothing like the great telescopic lenses of today or the great 40-inch refractive telescope at the Yerkes Observatory, 60 miles northwest of Chicago.

"With all these facilities astronomers will this time work in harmony, and a committee on comets was some time ago formed for the purpose of reporting a plan for observing Halley's comet. This committee reported yesterday at the final session of the Astronomical and Astrophysical Society of America, at the Yerkes Observatory, on Lake Geneva, Wis.

"A series of telescopic photographs will be taken at the Lick, Yerkes, Naval and other observatories in this country and all the large observatories abroad, including those at Berlin, Vienna, Paris and Greenwich. We want to get a long series of actual telescopic photographs of this comet on its coming cruise through the heavens. The comet will first be picked up somewhere off in space by some photographic telescope. We think we know just about where the comet will make its debut, but can't yet see it. The moment it is found the news will be flashed around the world.

"There will be no trouble seeing it with the naked eye. It will illuminate the heavens. We have some early Chinese prints representing it as a golden dragon of the heavens. It will make a tremendous splash of fire. After it once comes and goes it will shoot away from the earth, going as far away as Neptune, the most distant of the planets, passing all of the other planets en route, including Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter and Mars.

"We have calculated that Halley's comet is now within the orbit of Jupiter," said the astronomer, "and is rushing toward the orbit of the earth at the rate of a million miles a day. As a faint nebulus object in the constellation Orion it will no doubt be picked up in a few weeks. Celestial photography has it already located in limitless space far beyond the vision of the most delicate telescopic research. As the comet enters into the orbit of our solar system it will grow brighter every day until it becomes visible to the naked eye—the most spectacular object in nearly 100 years.

"There will be no danger of a collision with the earth. When closest it will be about 20,000,000 miles away. It should be brightest about next May."

TO FIGHT EGRET SALES

People Protest Uncle Sam's Auction of Murdered Mother Birds

States Refused to Seek Protective Laws—Farmers Join Movement Against Milliners.

New York, August 25.—Shocked by the thought of Uncle Sam selling the nuptial plumes of many mother birds, butchered in the midst of their starving young, thousands of Americans have today joined a movement of protest against such a disposal of the egrets, seized by the custom house in this city, which the government has just ordered to be sold here. From almost every state in the union scores of communications have been received by the National Association of Audubon Societies at its headquarters, 141 Broadway, offering support and urging action to prevent putting the nation in the bloody business of the milliners who are insisting upon this humiliating step. By its lax legislation and law enforcement against the bird butchers, the Empire State is alone responsible in this instance for thus making the government traffic in these spoils of murdered motherhood, it is declared.

While these costly heron plumes are today held here at the custom house to be auctioned off to the milliners whose women customers still call for the barbaric trophies in the bonnets, hundreds of wives and mothers in this city and throughout the country are organizing to protest against this national shame. Backing the Audubon workers in this movement the National Federation of Women's Clubs is already arrayed, as well as many sportsmen's organizations and granges, whose members want the birds to protect their crops rather than to become the dead wares of a few Broadway milliners. From several friends and appreciators of bird life money has been sent to be devoted to fighting the milliners, whose commercial backing has enabled them with a staff of lawyers to urge Uncle Sam to traffic in these scalps of mother birds much against his will.

Plans to prevent any further possibility of the government profiting by the sale of these egrets, torn from the backs of butchered females with young, are already being made in this city. State and federal officials are to be at once warned of the urgency of their duty in this matter, and every effort made by the people in states where laws are lax on this point to obtain legislation forbidding the sale of egrets by government officials. In New York State particularly, the officials whose attitude was the chief cause given by the government for reversing its former decision to destroy the contraband heron plumes, will be urged to take every possible action to prevent a repetition of this national disgrace through the Empire State.

"We are in this fight against bird butchery to stay," said William Dutcher, president of the National Association of Audubon Societies, at is headquarters, 141 Broadway, today. "Although the milliners may appear to have won a temporary victory in insisting that our government traffic in these trophies of the wholesale butchery of mothers who must leave their young to starve we believe the country will be soon aroused to combat this disgrace to the whole nation. Now that the people are waking up to the economic importance of bird protection we feel sure that we shall soon rally to our support every truly patriotic citizen of America."
