1860 January - May Cooper Harris Incoming Letters 1449

her removal was somewhat sudden, and I believe unexpected by herself. She had felt the nerves of the spine to be more than usually affected by a short Railway journey from Selby to Carlisle, where my father had for some years liked to spend a part of the year. This was on the 8th Dec.r ~~still~~ But as there was nothing new in the symptoms though rather boisterous and tossing perhaps longer than usual, my father was not anxious, and ~~was~~ on the Saturday previous to her death, my father sat up for several hours, and seemed as well as usual, remarking to my sister Anna that she felt getting better.

She retired to rest as usual and soon fell asleep — my father was so satisfied, that he soon dropped asleep, and it was not till towards the morning that some peculiarity in my mother's breathing roused the anxiety of those at home. The doctor on being sent for, confirmed this fear, but nothing that was administered, seemed to give relief: my mother never thoroughly roused, tho' Ran to say several times
