FARMERS AND SENATORS.

There are two hundred thousand farms in Michigan. Hence the significance of the report that the State Grange and the farmers' clubs are actively opposing the reelection of Julius Cæsar Burrows to the United States Senate.

In contemplating the Upper House of Congress many questions come into the mind. The first of them is this: How in the world did two-thirds of the members ever get there?

Occasionally we know the answer. Thanks to Senatorial investigation, for example, we knew how Clark, of Montana, obtained his seat. A consensus of opinion seems to solve the riddle in the case of Guggenheim, of Colorado. The peculiar political convolutions that issued in the election of Lorimer, of Illinois, are still tolerably fresh in the recollection of newspaper readers. But there are many other cases as to which no answer of a specific nature occurs to mind.

The general answer is that, until recently, farmers and the common mass of citizens were supposed to take the same interest in the election of a Senator from their state as in the appointment of a minister from this country to Brazil. There were a few simple requirements—that is, the gentleman should possess a silk hat, a mellifluous voice and be of tolerably sober habits. Possessing these qualifications, and having been duly selected by a handful of mysterious persons at the capitals the people were supposed to accept him without question and to refer to him with pride as "our Senator." The dozen men who really ran the Senate ought logically to have furnished the silk hats as they furnish the ideas to go under them. But this little detail was over looked. If farmers are going to take a hand in picking out Senators there will presently, we opine, be a grand opportunity to get some forty or more second-hand silk hats at a bargain.

THE PROMOTER'S RAKE-OFF.

Saturday Evening Post.

A certain new company that was investigated by a well-known New York actuary is typical. The par value of the stock was $10 but it was then being sold at from $25 to $40 a share. The agent's commission was 75 per cent. In one instance, according to the sworn report made by the actuary, the agent sold stock at $25 a share to a small investor, but delivered his own stock for which he had only paid $20. In additon to this rake-off of $5 on each share he got his commission fee. In a score of new companies you find that the principal ambition of the promoter of the company was to exact all the tribute he could out of the stock. In several cases it was shown that by the time all the stock had been sold the promoters themselves scarcely owned a share.

Right here comes the question that all the people who were solicited and who are being solicited to buy this sort of stock should ask: If this stock is such a good thing, why should the cost of its promotion be so high, and why should it be hawked about by canvassers? The men who formed the great old companies employed no such methods. They got together quietly, formed the company and went about their business. Instead of paying excessive commissions for the sale of the stock they sought by economy and prudence to conserve their assets. It is possible to repeat the performance today, and it has been done in many communities by the organization of home fire and life insurance companies. But when you look at the records of the most successful companies you find that the stock was not promoted.

The investor will find it a safe rule to follow when he keeps away from any sort of exploited or promoted security.

THE WISDOM OF TWO-STRIKE.

When General George H. Harris was out at the Rosebud Agency at the same time of the Sioux troubles, part of his work was to get Indians to sign some treaties.

One chief named Two-Strike, one night agreed to sign, but when it came time for him to come next morning, touch the pen and make his mark, he reneged. It was important to get him, for his signature controlled about three hundred Indians.

"Me no sign," grunted Two-Strike.

"Why not?" asked Harris persuasively. "You promised last night to sign this morning."

Two-Strike said a short sentence in Sioux and the interpreter turned to Harris and translated. "The chief says he has thought it over and will not sign, for he notices every time he touches that thing"—pointing to the pen—"he loses something."

THE FAILING APPETITE.

We've got right smart sailing folks around here, or they say they are," said the hotelkeeper at Mitchell, Indiana. "Now, there's old Uncle Jim. Ninety years old, if he's a day, and always grunting around like he was ready to die next minute. He went into the store the other day and the clerk said: 'How be ye today, Uncle Jim?' "

" 'Fellin' awful bad,' said Uncle Jim. 'My stomach's all gone. Can't eat nuthin. Didn't sleep a wink last night for the misery of it. Nigh unto death, I am.' " He grunted around some more and then he saw a basket of turnips,' he said to the clerk. 'How much be they?'

" 'Twenty cents a peck,' says the clerk.

" 'Well,' says Uncle Jim, 'gimme half a peck on 'em,' and he took them and I'll be goshswizzled if he didn't pull out his old jackknife and eat that hull half peck of raw turnips right then and there."

"Well, my little man," inquired a visitor pleasantly, "who are you?"

"I'm the baby's brother," was the ingenuous reply.—Truth Seeker.

EXECUTIVE NEARER THE PEOPLE.

(Omaha Bee.)

National events have developed a condition of affairs which completely shatters the political tradition that our chief executive is further removed from the people than the lawmaking body. Between the administrations of Washington and Taft a wide difference has developed. Washington was set apart from the people as far as possible that he might get the general perspective of the affairs of the entire nation. He dealt with affairs of the state almost as an abitrator and was hedged in from the people by the accepted interpretation of the functions of his office. But now the tendency is quite the opposite Roosevelt and Taft have been primarily presidents of the people looking to the people, popular sentiment and interests to guide their judgment and they have held themselves responsible to the whole people for their actions.

Although our forefathers wrought wisely and well, they overlooked the extent to which our varied and diversified interests would separate the different sections. It has developed that senators are, as a rule, influenced by sectional and congressmen by districts interests, without power to rise above their own constituencies to act for the whole people. In this evolution the presidency has become the one office of the whole people. The American people have not argued this out and accepted it as a last resort, but have just naturally fallen into the habit of looking to the president for leadership. As a result the presidency is primarily the people's direct representative office and has gained immeasurably in consequent importance.

LIVING IN THE PAST.

(Charleston News and Courier.)

We suppose that in every period of life there are those who live in the past. Perhaps some of them have reached that age, the saddest of all, which knows no future; upon the past they depend for the present, the present being to them truly "the passage way to eternity." Their activities are over, and if their declining years are made happier by memories of yesterday, there are none to begrudge them this blessing. There are many other persons, however, who, notwithstanding the present into which they have grown, persist in finding their only satisfaction, if not happiness, in the glories of the past. To them the days that are over were the only ones worth living, forgetting that in all probability they had little or no part in the making of those days. The present is too commonplace, too prosaic, too unromantic to duplicate "the brave deeds of old," but the glamor of years may have lent an added charm to "the brave deeds of old," and perhaps if one could bridge backward over the space of years and make of the past the present, it is not improbable that the deeds of those days would not very much outrank the accomplishments of our own age. It is the part of wisdom not to depend on the past or to peer into the future for the molding of the present. We will never be any more ready to live than we are at present and it is no use to let our faculties and power of enjoyment grow rusty while we wait in vain for a more opportune time.

RULES FOR SUCCESS.

(Indianapolis Star.)

Mr. Patten, the Chicago Board of Trade operator who made a big fortune last year by speculating in wheat and cotton, told a New York interviewer the other day that there are as many opportunities for success in this country as there were when he began to earn his living in Illinois 40 years ago. "Hard work is one of the best receipts I know," he said, "if a man wishes to gain success."

This is a stereotyped saying of men who have themselves attained the summit of their desires in business or other line of worldly achievement. It is true but it is only half a truth. The world is full of men who have worked hard all their lives, have slaved and toiled and done all within their power to achieve wealth or distinction or fame or whatever object most appealed to them and have failed. Work was essential, but it was not enough. They each lacked some indispensable quality that together with labor, might have brought them what they sought. It may have been initiative, the insight to recognize opportunity, the courage to take risks, the determination to get out of ruts, the ability to forecast the future, the power of imagination.

A LACK OF FORESIGHT.

Early in life George Moses, now the American Minister to Greece, wanted a job as a page in the New Hampshire egislature and needed it, too.

He went to the Capital and was told to see Cheney, then an influential politician who, he was told, controlled the Legislature. He stated his case to Cheney, but Cheney coldly turned him down, and Moses got along without his job as page and, finally, came to be the editor of the biggest paper in New Hampshire.

One day Cheney came into Moses' office and asked for a favor. It was something vital to Cheney. He needed it almost as much as Moses had needed the job as page.

Moses heard him through. Then he leaned back in his chair and said: "Cheney, I'm going to tell you a story I have never told to any other person." Whereupon he related, with the tremolo stop working, the tale of his boyhood ambition to be a page.

"Cheney," he said, "do you expect me to grant you this favor? I was that boy you turned down so hard and cold."

That would have feazed any other person except Cheney. It never made a dent in him. Instead, he leaned over the table and asked: "Moses, why in the thunder didn't you tell me then what you were going to be?"

Avarice is to the intellect and heart what sensuality is to the morals.

MUST WADE STREAMS WHEN CAMPAIGNING IN ARKANSAS.

Washington, D. C., March 6—Representative Oldfield of Arkansas, who has just achieved notoriety by reason of having introduced a bill at the request of Senator "Jeff" Davis in which Davis was interested as counsel, is beginning to find that remaining in Congress is almost as hard a proposition as getting there.

Mr. Oldfield was telling some of his colleagues today of the difficulties of campaigning in his section of the country. He laughed at the Representatives of the cities who were boasting of the strenuosity of their biennial campaign.

WADED IN STREAMS.

"Come out into my district to run for Congress," said Oldfield, "and you will have a hard job ahead of you. Of course we are not much bothered by Republicans. Our great trouble is in getting over the district before the nomination. The last time I ran for Congress I was on the go from early in the morning until late at night. I had to make a lot of towns that are not touched by railroads. Traveling had to be done in a buckboard. Frequently we had to wade streams with the water up around our waists. In flood seasons this was more or less of a perilous job and a great deal depended on the nerve of the driver.

"Here was the situation: If I and my opponent for the Democratic nomination were billed to speak in the same town on the same night I just naturally had to get there regardless of the danger of being swept down river.

BEST DRIVER IN STATE.

"With good horses and a nervy driver I got there all right. If my opponent was less fortunate he failed to show up. The result was that I got the votes of that town and he did not. That being the situation I got the best negro driver in the State of Arkansas and my election was as much due to his staying qualities as to my oratory.

"You city fellows will not know what it means to run for Congress until you campaign as we do in Arkansas."

CRITICISM OF PUBLIC MEN.

(Cincinnati Enquirer.)

No one who has given any candid attention to the subject will question that the men in Congress, at the head of the departments and on the bench, are as a whole more than fairly representative of the average character and ability of the people. They are above the average or they would not as a rule be selected. Any one who has been brought into contact with them to any considerable extent knows that taken throughout they are a body of upright, conscientious, patriotic, well-meaning men, intending to do within limitations what they think best for the country.

As a matter of fact, however, those chosen are good representatives, but no sooner are they in their seats than a hue and cry of depreciation and criticism begins against Congress especially. It is seen in the press, and especially in reform journals and magazines, the writing of whose articles one must suppose from their tone are so superior mentally and morally to the subjects of their animadversions that they belong to a distinct and higher race. Were they but in the place of the miserable incompetents, most of whose characters and motives are at least open to suspicion, how vastly better off the country would be. The same sort of thing is heard among business men who ought to know better, and really do, if they but stopped to think; it is also current in fashionable drawing rooms among their more witless and ignorant habitues.

HER OVERDRAFT.

A prominent banker in the city was talking the other day of the foibles of some of his feminine depositors.

"Women are queer creatures when it comes to business," he said. "For one thing, no woman can understand why we wont send her unlimited amounts of money if she asks for it over the telephone.

"But the funniest incident I've known happened the other day. We sent word to one of our woman depositors that her account was overdrawn. We expected her to be angry. They usually are. But she wasn't.

"No indeed. She sat down and wrote us a gracious and lovely little letter on crested paper, thanking us for letting her know that her account was overdrawn.

" 'I am so glad to oblige you by remedying the defect at once,' she wrote.

"And she inclosed a check for $750 drawn on our own bank."—Philadelphia Times.

THE BEE INDUSTRY.

Mr. Hesson of this county, is anxious to help along the bee industry in Maryland. He introduced two bills on Wednesday of last week to provide for the incorporation of the Maryland State Beekeepers' Association and one to suppress contagious diseases among bees by creating the office of inspector of apiaries. An appropriation of $500 per annum is asked with which to enable the inspector to carry on his work. The state entomologist also became state bee inspector with power to appoint assistants. They are required to visit apiaries when so requested and to ascertain if the insects are infested with American or European foul brood or any other disease. If the cisease is not stamped out the inspector or his assistant can, if need be, burn all colonies of infected bees and hives. Persons engaged in raising queen bees are required to have their apiaries inspected at least twice each year.

—"Peculiar woman, my wife; very liberal. Why, the pin money I give her she invariably spends for pins" "Um! Overstocked aren't you?' "Oh no! You see, there are hat, hair neck, shawl, safety, clothes and rolling-pins. When this list is exhausted I've no doubt she'll have us dining on terrapins."—Boston Transcript.
