SHOES AT $535 A PAIR.

A Sure Cure For Locomotor Ataxia.

A couple of gentlemen from the South were chatting in the Rennert lobby last evening. They were friends who had not met in several years, as one had been a resident of an Eastern city in that interval. The other was a fine looking man of about 35, apparently in excellent health, save a bad limp in his walk which neccessitated the use of a cane. He explained to his companion that he was a victim of that dread affliction, locomotor ataxia.

"I have been everywhere on this continent and have done everything possible in seeking a cure," said the afflicted man. "The best encouragement I can get is that the further progress of the disease may be arrested. There is no reputable physician who will say that the disease is curable. So far it has baffled the best skill of the profession. Like all sick men I have occassionally been induced to try the services of quacks and spent a lot of money on that charlatan tribe until I found out just what humbugs they were.

"After seeing my bank account would buy a good many thousands I grew skeptical and let the quacks alone. But they would not let me alone. The last one who tried to get a fee out of me told me a lovely story of a wonderful pair of shoes which he said would bring back my health if I would wear them a little while. One pair would cure me, he said, but it might require several. For the first he would charge me only $535, and after that all subsequent pairs would be the mere bagatelle of $35. It would make me a sound man and was the opportunity of my life. After listening to this fairy tale, I made a counter proposition. I agreed to take the first pair at $35 and if they brought me the promised relief I would pay the man $500 for a second pair. The faker smiled in a sad and feeble way, and said he wouldn't think of letting his magic shoes go for such a trifle, whereupon we parted.

"It's a pity there was no solid merit back of his proposition, for if ever a man could make shoes that would cure locomotor ataxia, he would have something far better than a gold mine."—Balto. American.

Sentiment.

(Ohio State Journal.)

It is probably true that when human affairs were started on this globe, a principle of justice, truth and love was attached to them for their government. We sometimes fear that principle has lost its way and that the affairs are getting along without it. But that is because we have lost faith; we think that vanity, illwill and selfishness have crept in and throttled the noble truth and kicked it aside. That is pessimism, which holds that the world was made for the bad, and that the triumph of the right is not to be dreamed of. That is the doctrine of despair and too many people are afflicted by it.

It is all wrong. Hope, faith and patience constitute the true rule of life. These are the basis of endeavor and right living. They hold a man true and adorn experience. Principle will work out its own and be faithful to the man who is faithful to it. It always happens so. It may seem different at times, but it is only seeming. Good is never the fruit of wrong, but is always the fruit of good.

Iowa's Curious Proposal.

[Boston Transcript]

Governor Carroll, of Iowa, proposes to reduce the rural highways of the state, which now averages 60 feet in width, to 40, turning the margin of 10 feet on each side into use by the farmers in raising corn. He computes that this transfer would result in an added yield of 8,000,000 bushels a year. That he should even propose such a thing shows how completely cultivated the better Mississippi Valley States have become. No one riding through rural New Hampshire, for example, even if its highways were needlessly wide, would propose the turning of any part of them back to private owners in order to enlarge their crops, since so much of the land they now have lies in disuse.

A good solution for the Iowans might be for the public to retain title to the highways at the full width, but to allow a strip of 10 feet on each side to be utilized by the owner of the adjoining property until such time as the growth of population made it desirable in any place to employ the whole street surface. This is the system in the District of Columbia, and it works admirably.
