

A CHALLENGE

We challenge comparison. Compare our lumber and our prices with the lumber and prices of others. Then you will see why it is that so many of the careful, shrewd builders buy of us. They have found that we carry the grades they want, and sell them at very moderate cost. Let us serve you also.

Tonsiline Cures Sore Throat

The throat is one of the most delicate parts of the body. It is also one of the most important, and should be given the best possible care.

The throat is the gateway to the body. The air we breathe, the food we eat, the liquids we drink, all pass through it. It is very easily affected by cold, strain, exposure, etc., and Sore Throat is therefore one of our most common ailments. Strangely enough, it is also one of the most neglected.

Sore Throat is a very serious matter, for the whole system is in danger in consequence of it.

Every Sore Throat patient is a candidate for Tonsilitis, Quinsy, Diphtheria and other serious or fatal diseases, all of which can be prevented by the timely cure of the Sore Throat by the use of TONSILINE.

If taken in time a dose or two will do it.

TONSILINE is made to cure throat diseases and nothing else. It is the one remedy for this purpose sold largely in the United States. Every user endorses it; every physician, knowing its virtues, commends it.

The one most important thing to remember about TONSILINE is the fact that it really does cure Sore Throat.

The Union Sunday school outing held in Ohler's Grove Wednesday last, was the most enjoyoble gathering that has taken place in this vicinity this summer. The ministers foot race participated in by Revs. Hafer, Stangle, Wolf and Downie, was one of the most interesting features of the afternoon's attractions. Strange to say the heaviest and shortest legged minister won the race. Bag races by others furnished lots of fun for the large crowd present, there being four Sunday schools represented.

The WOMAN

"That's right," agreed Gregg, "but the Mullins bill will be defeated before they get time to overturn Standish. The people are awake. They really seem to have an idea we ought to keep some of our promises. And, say! After all, we did promise them a lot of things."

"Did we?" echoed Neligan. "We made our platform look like a cross-section of the Ten Commandments fringed with pages of Pilgrim's Progress. Yah! That's the trouble. We're over-promised."

"If we could loosen Standish's pull with the parsons," said Neligan, "we'd have him against the ropes in one round."

"Now you are talking sanity," approved the lawyer. "That was just what I was waiting to suggest."

"Well, we didn't wait for you to suggest it," retorted Neligan. "We aren't corporation law-contortionists, perhaps, but we've got a few grains of gray matter left. That's the first stunt we tried. We put good men on the case to look up Standish's record—to find one break that we could hang a story on."

"Well?"

"Well, from their reports, Standish seems to have led a life that would make Saint Anthony and Sir Galahad and the Pilgrim fathers look like a bunch of soused Tenderloin rounders."

"You're sure your men left nothing uncovered?"

"Do you think we'd overlook anything when the whole game hangs on it?"

"That's right, Van Dyke," supplemented Gregg. "We've been over Standish's record with a microscope. He's cost us enough to make the search mighty careful. Even if you don't give us credit for sense enough to probe the business, you'll have to allow that Mark Robertson's no fool. And Robertson's moved heaven and hell to get something on Standish. But he can't. Robertson's got more at stake than any of us. If Standish licks him in this fight and gets the speakership it'll cost Mark Robertson more than most people could understand. Self-respect and ambition and future and—"

"It sure will," agreed Neligan. "Let's see—it must be close on five years, now, that Standish and Robertson have been at each other's throats. Five years—no, six. Ever since Robertson ran for governor and Standish dug up that smelly franchise deal against him. Robertson's had it in for him ever since."

"Just when I'm all loaded up to the guards with perfectly good stock that will go to pieces like a card house when the bill fails!" wailed Gregg.

"Cut out the whine!" ordered Neligan. "You aren't the only man who's bought stock that Standish will turn into waste paper. Oh, that man Standish! He's got the country running after him like a flock of hens after the farmer at feeding-time. They think his private life's got Saint Peter and Anthony Comstock lashed to the mast and that his politics are so pure they'd make Abraham Lincoln feel like a ward heeler. He's no man. He's a bloodless saint. I don't believe he ever so much as squeezed a woman's hand in his life or swigged anything stronger than sarsaparilla. How are we going to get the hooks into a fellow like that?"

"I don't know how!" flared Van Dyke. "But it's Jim Blake's business to know. He was supposed to be running the house and holding our men together. What's Jim been doing to let things get away from him like this?"

"Ah, can it!" snarled Neligan, at once up in arms in defense of his adored leader. "Throw the blame all over the shop if you've got to. Rub it into our hair. But don't spill any of it on Jim Blake. Tell me this, before you hand out any more kindly criticisms: Did Jim ever lose a trick that any mortal man could have taken? Did he? Isn't he the best house leader the organization ever had? Hasn't he put you people into the way of grabbing millions?"

"Cool off, Neligan,' laughed Van Dyke. "Why, good lord, Tim, I think as much of Jim Blake as you do. He's a splendid upright man and—"

"He is not!" fiercely contradicted Neligan. "He's a grafter. And everybody knows it. But, by the powers, he's the very best grafter in the business. And, what's more, he's my friend. And—"

"And the best way to show we agree on at least one thing," said Van Dyke, rising and laying a hand on each of his companions' shoulder, "is to adjourn to the bar and see what effect three or four cocktails will have on the department of the interior. Come along. We can leave word to be sent for when Jim comes in."

Having thus calmed the storm in the one possible fashion, he led the way toward the bar, the two others following amicably enough. As they passed the switchboard Wanda Kelly's voice was droning:

"H'lo. No. Mr. Standish isn't in yet. Yes. A'ri'."

CHAPTER IV.

The Clash.

The telephone girl looked up a minute later to see Tom Blake hanging once more over the rail.

"I got a telegram from Grace," said he. "She sent it to me, I suppose, instead of to dad or Mark because she knew I'd be loafing around the hotel at this hour and she didn't know when either of them would be back from the capitol. Says she'll be in Washington at eight. But, being a woman or else thinking I'm a mind-reader, she doesn't say whether it'll be eight this evening or eight tomorrow morning. I've been looking everywhere since I got it, to find Mark and—Excuse me!"

Ex-Governor Robertson was crossing the corridor toward them and Tom hurried to meet him with the telegram. Robertson's cold face, as he read the dispatch, softened in a way that would have amazed his political foes.

"Good!" he said emphatically. "But why doesn't she tell whether she means tonight or in the morning? Isn't that just like Grace?"

"Why not call her up on long distance?" suggested Tom. "If she'll be here at eight tonight she'll have left New York long before now. And if she isn't coming till morning—"

"Good idea!" assented Robertson, starting for the telephone alcove. "Sometimes you actually show a gleam of human intelligence, Tom, in spite of the way you've taken to mooning around lately. I'll—"

He stopped short, and the unwonted look of happiness froze from his face. He and Tom, on their way to the alcove, were passing the short flight of steps that led down from the outer foyer to the corridor.

And a man was coming down those steps. A tall man, whose shoulders were slightly stooped, whose dark hair was beginning to grizzle at the temples, whose swarthy and somewhat heavy face was lined and hardened by marks that did not seem to have come from time's brush alone.

At sight of him Robertson halted. His face darkened and his hands involuntarily clenched. The newcomer glanced across and his eye met the ex-governor's lowering gaze; then passed carelessly on to Tom.

"Good evening, gentlemen," he said.

"Good evening, Mr. Standish," answered Tom.

Robertson barely returned the other's nod. But as Standish made as though to pass on, he took an impulsive step toward the insurgent chief.

"Well, Standish," he observed, steadying his voice by a palpable effort into some semblance of civility, "I understand the fight's on for tonight."

"Yes," answered Standish, pausing as though merely to wait until the other should move from his path. "An all-night session, probably."
