Westminster Town

There's a little town in Maryland
High posted on the hills;
The winds of God come sweeping down,
They scatter many ills.
They hurry over land and stream
With sweetest breath of wealth;
Then down across the orchards
To touch on Nature's wealth.
So, that this town of rain and dew,
North, South and East and West,
God's country all around it,
May give to all its best.
The skies are just as blue today,
The shade trees grow in glory,
The old time gardens grow again,
Each uower tells its story:
And up and down its lane and streets
The children sing and play;
Again they live our school days o'er
The same old happy way.
Westminster M. C. beacon light
Like Grecian Athen's old
Weaves round the youth, Minerva's woof
Of intellectual fold.
The world's fierce glare and cruelty
Lie but short leagues away;
Live we our lives by Heaven's best,
How short their fairest day.
More beautiful may be some spot
In vale by ocean wide,
But on Westminster's many hills
You'll find the sunny side.

Short Sermon By a Layman.

Denying the Master.

Mat. 26:75.—And he went out and wept bitterly.

The spectacle of a brave man weeping is calculated to excite pity in the breast of any one moved by the impulses of humanity; and especially if the source of sorrow is the failure of the distressed one to discharge some imperative duty or to have burdened the conscience with an evil act. Strong men may have tender hearts and weep over the woes of others, but are prone to bear their own unavoidable griefs with unfaltering courage. "But a wounded conscience who can bear:" or who can endure a sense of treachery to a loved friend. In that case it is not cowardice but self-reproach that breaks the heart of a true man and moves him. You will say to this that a true man cannot be guilty of treachery, or to an act that is akin to it, the desertion of that friend in the hour of his greatest need.

Yet it was this sense of unworthiness that drove Peter out of the judgment hall of Caiaphas when Our Lord turned and looked upon him after his triple denial that he knew Him. That look pierced his soul and laid it bare to his own comprehension. He saw himself as he was, a weak staff to lean upon in the hour of adversity, an unfaithful friend in the hour when he believed fidelity on his part to his master was most needed. And the revulsion of feeling that swept over him at that moment filled him with unutterable anguish. The thought that he, who just a little while before had made the proud boast that though all others might desert and deny the Master, yet he would remain faithful unto death, was more than he, strong and rugged man that he was, could bear. That he could have denied with cursing and swearing, that he knew the man, must, when his conscience was awakened and he contemplated his action, have seemed to him like an impossible nightmare from which he would be aroused to a sense of a better reality. "And he went out and wept bitterly."

It is impossible to tell just what sort of language Peter used in "cursing and swearing." It is inconceivable that it could have been what is commonly called profanity. It was probably some form of speech generally employed among the Jews to accentuate and emphasize an assertion, and not what we would call, in the meaning attached to the words at this time, "cursing and swearing." Nor is it important to dwell upon their literal meaning if it was known. It is enough to know that the denial was made with violent asseveration, and that the enormity of it utterly unmanned the apostle and sent him in self-abasement to weep out his contrition and sorrow. Just what other part Peter played in the great tragedy of Calvary we may not know. Perhaps in self-condemnation he may have fled from the scene of the trial and crucifixion and hidden himself from the sight of all men. Well might he have imagined that if any saw him they would have gibed at him as the man who deserted his master.

But Peter was not a coward. He had given an exhibition of his courage in the Garden of Gethsemane where he smote Malchus, the servant of the high priest, and cut off his ear with the sword. But then he was defending the Master and was ready to fight for Him. In the high priests' palace he saw Him meekly enduring that functionary's cross-examination and answering nothing. He was a bitterly disappointed man and for a little while perhaps felt that the Master was an imposter. If that was his thought the whole current of feeling which accompanied it was changed by the look his Lord and Master turned upon him. We find him on the morning of the resurrection in company with John, and it is probable that he sought the companionship of that gentle and loving disciple soon after the crucifixion. It was John who had taken him into the high priests' palace when Jesus was arraigned before Caiaphas. And it was with John he hastened to the sepulchre when told by the women that the Lord was risen. He then had recovered his natural boldness and went at once into the sepulchre. He was probably still partially unconvinced of the resurrection. But his love for the Master had revived in all its intensity and never again was it clouded by the shadow of a doubt.

And the Master, we know, responded with all His divine love to the affection and devotion of His repentant disciple, upon whom he laid the injunction feed my sheep, feed my lambs. It is not probable that this was a charge specially laid upon Peter, separate from the other apostles, it is rather to be understood as the method used by the Master to restore Peter to an equality with the other members of the Apostolic College. No other interpretation of its meaning seems reasonable. And thereafter Peter was faithful even unto death and sealed his devotion with his blood.

And now, it is to this history of Peter the disciples of Jesus at this day can turn with hope when they too have denied Him. And who among them all has not, at some time during their christian career, denied Him. Not, it is true, in words, and perhaps not in open acts; but in the secrecy of their own hearts. For every sin against God is a practical denial of the Master. "And there is no man that liveth and sinneth not." The consciences of some are more tender than of others, and when they have lapsed from the path of rectitude they are tempted, in despair, to give up the fight against sin. How can they measure up to the divine standard? How can they overcome when here, on every side, are temptations, and within them a law against their minds bringing them into captivity to the law of sin in their members? And if they be without a tender conscience they are in greater danager of denying the Master, because of self-righteousness. May the Lord turn and look upon these as he looked upon Peter, until their hearts are broken with contrition and a true knowledge of self.

Peter did not know himself. He believed he was entirely devoted to the Master and was ready to die with Him. The sequel revealed his utter inefficiency to meet and understand temptation without divine aid. But the believer with a tender conscience must not despair. Neither should he who is self-righteous if his poor weak, siniful self-righteous heart has faith in the Divine Son of God as the only mediator between man and his Maker. It is better, however, to deprecate our unworthiness, than to trust to our own well doing, however strong our sense of dependence upon God may be.

It is not the purpose of these reflections to point out specific acts of waywardness and wrong doing as ways of denying the Master. Of these we must become conscious by meditation and prayer. And thus becoming conscious we will have the story of Christ's dealing with Peter as our comfort and assurance that He will not cast us off. That He is very pitiful and of tender mercy and will restore us to His favor when we stray away but repent as did Peter.

The greatest danger of our denying Christ lies, first, in our neglect of communion with Him, and secondly, in our absorption in a multiplicity of worldly affairs. There can be no real enjoyment of spiritual blessings without they are constantly sought by the means which He has appointed. Zeal grows faint and the heart cold and unsympathetic when these are neglected, so that we may have a name for godliness without the power thereof. And that is a real if not a glaring, denial of Christ. That is having a name to live though dead to the true enjoyment of the christian life, and to the higher things of the spirit. For those who are in such a case well will it be to imitate the example of Peter, repent of the denial of the Master and find, as Peter did, His gracious forgiveness.

GIST

The drouth here was broken Tuesday evening by a nice rain.

Mr. John Shuey, of New Windsor, was the guest of Mr. A. G. Phillips Tuesday.

Several of our folks attended the Dutch picnic at Smallwood and the lawn fete at Westminster on Saturday.

Mr. Theodore Blizzard has purchased a new piano.

Messrs. John Jordan and Gordon are building new barns this season and U. S. Smith and Columbus Neugon are each building a house.

Mr. Samuel Wilson, wife and daughter attended the picnic at Mt. Airy, Saturday.

Master Tilden, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kopp, who as was stated in last week's paper, met with a very serious accident, seems to be getting along as well as can be expected.

SUMMER ADVERTISING

A careful study of the advertising in the big metropolitan papers shows that a great deal of costly publicity work is done in the summer. The big department stores do not quit in July and August. Their sales may not be quite up to the level of spring or fall. All the more reason, according to their philosophy, why they should push for trade.

They argue that the profitable store is the one that is busy all the year around at the same level. The advertising that helps keep their trade normal in summer is really more profitable than the advertising that brings in more trade at a time when people are naturally buying freely.

The advertising men who handle this big store work are good guides for the small merchants to follow. They have carefully analyzed the various theories of advertising. If they believe it pays to advertise largely in summer, it will pay for their competitors throughout retail trade.

In smaller cities, there is some little tendency for advertising to drop in summer. It is done on the theory that trade tends to drop at that time. It is about as sensible as if a farmer should refuse to feed his horse because the beast was a little more tired than usual. It is when the animal flags that the farmer sees that he is in need of the best grain.

If trade flags in summer, put the tonic of advertising into it!

Merchants may fear a drop in trade in summer, but one surmises that it is apt to be less than they anticipate. Of course forehanded people with plenty of money stocked up largely with summer goods some time ago. But many cautious people have waited until now for bargains. Many people are away, but many strangers are in this vicinity and disposed to buy if their trade is solicited.

FACTORY AND HOUSEHOLD ECONOMIES

The romance of waste products is a veritable El Dorado. Great fortunes have been made from materials supposed to be valueless. The first annual dinner of the National Association of Waste Material Dealers recently held, represented a business with a total volume of $700,000,000.

The story of coal tar is a bonanza by itself. Formerly the black, viscid liquid made in distilling gas was considered not merely good for nothing, but it was an actual expense and irritation. Now fortunes are made turning it into naphtha, pitch, creosote, paraffine, etc.

But while such splendid economie have been made in industrial plants, the average household has lost many arts by which waste was once utilized. People brought up by grandrathers and grandmothers of an economical turn of mind, will recall many thrifty little habits.

Making soap from grease was a traditional employment in many families. Now this toilsome task is known to but few housewives. Many families for a long time economized matches by making lamplighters. Long strips of paper were twisted into long slender sticks, that would hold a flame much longer than any kind of match.

How many families today have thrifty dickerings as of yore with the rag man? The housewife who swapped off carefully sorted white and colored rags for the spoil from the peddler's cart, used to be quick at a bargain. Another economy was the careful saving of every bit of twine, which was stored in the "string box." No one bought balls of twine then.

Such little economies strike a great many people as stingy today. Probably some of them took too much time to be worth while. But many fortunes were founded in just such patient little accumulations.

Children Cry FOR FLETCHER'S CASTORIA

SAFETY IN THE STREETS

In spite of all that is said about careful driving of automobiles, every few days one reads of children and sometimes older people, who are run over in the streets. In the large cities, heavy truck wagons are also a cause of much fatal injury.

Various agencies are at work to compel drivers to maintain due vigilance. But laws and regulations are difficult to enforce. There are all kinds of human types at the steering wheel. Officers of the law do not always want to see too much.

The street is not the safe place it used to be. Before motors became numerous, the public highway was a kind of common playground. Drivers of horses waited tolerantly while the kidlets reluctantly suspended their ball game.

The hoofs of an approaching horse gave warning long before a carriage was near. Now the motor slips up from behind with swift and deadly speed. While you are looking to the right, the machine has dodged out from some side street on the left.

Every child ought to be carefully warned of the dangers of the street. On streets where there is any considerable traffic, he should never cross without looking both ways.

Many accident could be saved if people were not in such a hurry. Some persons seem to dislike to show reasonable caution. It takes but a few seconds for a motor to pass, while a broken leg would mean a month on your back.

The manner in which some motorists expect every one to make way for them is irritating. Still human nature is as it is. One must adapt oneself to modern conditions.

If the pedestrian gets too wrathy over the arrogance of his automobiling friends, he may very reasonably reflect that it is much easier for him to stop than it is to bring a heavy machine to a standstill. That, however, does not excuse the motorist, who should never run at a speed which he can not check in time to prevent injury.
