FIRE AND STORM INSURANCE

—o—

Consult me before insuring your properties as I am certain I can save you some money.

I am writing insurance every day, both Fire and Storm, and nothing is beneath my notice, as I take large and small, and both receive my best attention.

Fires take place when least expected and it is mighty comforting to know that you are being taken care of by a first class company. Examine your policies before they expire and let me renew them for you. Prices are low compared with the protection given.

MANCHESTER

On Thursday evening of last week Mr. Henry Strevig with family and visiting lady friends went aboard the farm wagon of Mr. Clinton Lippy that was fitted up for a straw ride and filled to its full capacity with his family and friends fully equipped with refreshments to have a general good time down the macadam road, enjoying the moonlight ride and celebrating the birthday of one of the visiting ladies. They came out Foundry avenue into Main street with song and laughter, little thinking they were to have a tie-up so soon, but when near the Franklin House Mr. Strevig was taken with vertigo and fell from the wagon. He was raised up badly stunned and after a time was able to walk to his home. But the scare took all the enjoyment out of the company and they went back home and enjoyed their refreshments in a quiet manner.

Mrs. H. T. J. Lamotte passed a mile stone in the fortieth block of her pilgrimage on Sunday last and as she had been very much interested in the birthdays of the members of the family and provided something special for them to enjoy upon the occasions they thought it no more than right that she should enjoy a royal dinner upon her birthday. She was informed that Pop would take them to the hotel for dinner but behind Pop as a blind Mr. Lamotte was perfecting his plans to give her a complete surprise. After the morning service she went to her home and got in readiness to go to the hotel. At the noon hour she with Mr. Lamotte, her father and her uncle, Mr. E. H. Crouse, went to the Franklin House where mine host Staley ushered them into the parlor where the honored guest found Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hutchins, of Pikesville; Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Motter, of Baltimore; Mr. and Mrs. Wm. H. Shower, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Miller, Mrs. May E. Gettier, Misses Fannie G. Ross, Carrie and Edna Lamotte awaiting their arrival to extend their congratulations. That she was abashed is putting it mild but during the social half hour that followed she became herself and enjoyed the pleasantries of the occasion. All were then taken to the dining room where the table appointments were inviting and a royal dinner awaited them to which all did full justice, finishing with the harlequin ice cream and cake for a dessert. Although the surprise was great it was highly appreciated.

The Carroll Cigar Company is straightening up things to put on a full complement of workmen to supply the trade that their predecessors enjoyed. McDavidson, of Hanover, was here and took the measurement to install a complete sweating plant at the factory where they have a number of men at work.

The members of the Lutheran Aid Society held a festival on the school grounds under the maples on Saturday evening that was patronized and a neat sum added to their treasury. This factor of the congregation is doing its full duty in the building of the new church which is gradually being pushed forward. At this writing the walls are about midway to the top of the window frames; the large and small windows have all been secured by donors, some of which will be placed in memory of departed ones.

The mayor and council in order to follow up the plans of the surveyor graded North Main street at the summit and carted the earth and stone in block No. 2, North Main street, that required quite a fill, and now are getting the diggings from South Main street near the Franklin House, while the Shaffers are still busy putting in curbing and gutters and fine pavements.

HIS GOOD ADVISER

By MILDRED CAROLINE GOODRIDGE.

"Blunderhead!" angrily expostulated the bookkeeper of Ransom & Co.

"Look before you leap, Danny," in sweet solacing contrast followed the tones of the office stenographer, Nellie Deane.

"Wish I could. Guess I'll go stumbling through life just this same old way!" groaned Danny Skiles. "Wish you was my sister. I'd get out of here if it wasn't for you—yes, I would."

The electric button on the desk of the stenographer sounded an appeal just then. It was from Mr. Ransom's office. Hastily Nellie swept into a drawer—or rather fancied she swept into it—several pages of a letter she had been writing to her sister. One of the sheets, however, had slipped unnoticed over the edge of the desk and had fallen among a vast litter on the floor beside it.

Danny had precipitated the overflow of the waste paper basket only a few seconds previously. He had stumbled over it in the exercise of that extraordinary ability of his to deserve the common nickname of "Blunderhead." Danny was simply chronically irremediably clumsy. When he raised a window he generally smashed it. When he moved a chair he usually tipped it over. When he ran to attend to some urgent office call he stumbled over a rug or the linoleum.

"Drat that bookkeeper!" muttered Danny with a daggers look at crusty old Collins. "As to Sweetie—that's what I call her and that's just what she is—if I ever amount to anything it will be her kind ways to me that did it. She's pretty as a picture and good as gold. Yes, and I'll bet the boss knows it!" chuckled Danny wisely.

If "the boss," young Alden Ransom, knew it, however, he had spoken no word to convey the impression to his really competent stenographer. It was true that many times, even as just now, when Nellie sat in his private office taking dictation, it had been a relief from business cares and a positive pleasure to look at the delicate expressive face of the young girl and appreciate her buoyant accommodating ways and quick intelligence. If there was the dawning of love in the companionship, however, it was on the part of Nellie herself. In fact, she had just written the fact to her sister. And because she felt a growing fondness for her kindly indulgent employer she had decided to sever a tie that it might be difficult to break, later on by leaving the pleasant employ of Ransom & Co.

"Whillikens! She's in Love With the Boss!"

Meanwhile Danny had gathered up the letter on the floor of the main office and was cogitating over the great precept of wisdom that Miss Deane had sought to inculcate.

"Look before you leap," Danny repeated the axiom. "That fits me. Sweetie is a good adviser and I'm going to adopt that as my motto."

Danny picked a sheet of paper from the waste paper basket, folded it, took a stub of a pencil from his pocket and proceeded to diligently and laboriously place the appealing axiom upon its surface. He stowed the folded paper in his pocket as if it were some valued talisman and an unfailing remedy against blundering.

More than once during the rest of the day Danny consulted his creed. Then that night when he went to bed, he found he had learned his motto by heart and took out the sheet of paper to place it in a bureau drawer when he chanced to open it.

"Whew!" he ejaculated as he perused the inside of the sheet. "Why, it's part of a letter Sweetie has written to some relative or friend and —whillikens! she's in love with the boss."

Yes, that was certain. Miss Deane had written to her sister that Mr. Ransom had attracted her as never any man before. But she realized that gulf between them showed due humility in not construing his little acts of kindness into any marked attentions and was going to seek another position.

"Why, if she leaves Ransom & Co. I'm—lost!" wailed Danny. "Say, if she could marry the boss! Wish I was a matchmaker. What'll I do?"

This was as to the letter. Danny decided he would think things over before he said anything about it. Then came the crisis of Danny's life, and the "Blunderhead" of the office situation became a star character and hero.

Danny earned only four dollars a week and had to pay some board at home at that. This did not admit of any banquets. The week before he had bought a small bunch of violets to place on the desk of Miss Deane. She had scolded him severely, but Danny was proud to think he could spend 50 cents to show his devotion to the kindest friend he had ever known.

For the present week, therefore, Danny was wont to take his meals at a cheap beanery. There were items on the bill of fare that ran from four to seven cents. One evening he had to remain at the office overtime to stamp some mail. Six o'clock found him hungry with one-half an hour's work still undone. Danny went out for a bite. As he passed down a court running along the side of the building where the office was located, he noticed that the light in the room of the boss had been extinguished and the boss himself was just approaching his automobile, the only one in the solitary court.

Then there occurred something that made Danny think of a rapid moving picture show, it was all done so quickly. Three men had suddenly leaped from a dusk doorway. One sprang to the chauffeur's seat. Two others advanced upon Mr. Ransom. They threw a long coat over his head, lifted him into the machine, stifled his cries and away dashed the auto.

"Kidnaped! Just like in the movies!" gasped the petrified Danny.

In a flash he was after the speeding machine. As he ran an inspiration came to him. He drew out his big jackknife that was his constant companion, caught at the knob of the baggage box and clung there.

The automobile followed the court then an alley and then curved into a public street. It was here that Danny got ready for business.

He made a desperate lunge at the nearest rear wheel. Blade-deep through outer and inner sheathings of rubber went the knife. There was a hiss, then a frightful report. The chauffeur caught the warning sound. The auto sidled on a menacing slant. Danny sprang free, yelled for the police, the car was surrounded and "the boss" was rescued.

Mr. Ransom took Danny back to the office with him after the police had secured the kidnapers, who it appeared had set in motion the first section of a deep blackmailing plot.

"There's something else," said Danny, when the greater part of his story had been told—"there's Sweetie."

"Ah! what about Miss Deane, now?" questioned the young business man, with every token of deep interest.

And Danny produced the letter sheet. His eye sparkled as he knew what he had long hoped—that Miss Deane cared particularly for him. And then rather amusedly he read the scrawled words Danny had written:

"Look before you leap."

"Mr. Ransom," observed Danny fervently, "that's my motto, but you don't have to look before you leap if you're thinking about Sweetie. She's all gold, just like yourself!"

WHO DID WRITE SHAKESPEARE

Not Shakespeare or Bacon, but John Trussell, Is the Latest Theory Put Forth.

Another theory as to the identity of the ideal personality around which Shakespeare wrote many of his sonnets is advanced in a volume in which nobody would expect to find it. The volume is a cheap reprint of a sixteenth century devotional work, "The Triumph Over Death," by the Venerable Robert Southwell, a Jesuit priest.

The editor, J. W. Trotman, propounds the startling theory that Southwell is the friend celebrated in Shakespeare. The beautiful youth of the sonnets was a Jesuit, tortured by Topcliffe, imprisoned in the Tower for three years and finally dragged on a hurdle to Tyburn and hanged.

But neither Shakespeare nor Bacon, Mr. Trotman holds, wrote the immortal sonnets and plays. According to him they are the work of John Trussell, a member of a family resident for centuries at Billesley, near Stratford-on-Avon, and mayor of Winchester, where he made such a charming speech to Queen Henrietta Marie after her marriage there with Charles I that she declared she was as pleased as if he had given her 10,000 crowns. His poem, "The First Rape of Fair Helen," his champion says, is no less Shakespearian than "Venus and Adonis." As only one copy of its exists, and one has not had access to the private library in which it is preserved, one is unable to express an opinion on the point. It is evident that Mr. Trotman has prepared agreeable exercise for the wits of the critics.

The Reason He Does Not.

"I am quite sure that I can stop drinking when I have had enough."

"But you never seem to do it."

"I know it. You see, the trouble is that when I have had enough I don't know it."
