SIMPLIFYING DANCING

Last year the society world studied modern dancing. There were as many different dances as dancing teachers. A dozen or more forms of one dance, the one-step, were taught. Others also had many variations. The result was that the dance floors at the summer resorts were a jumble of conflicting steps last summer. The larger part of the crowd sat around the room, and watched other people get their feet twisted into bow-knots.

This year the dancing teachers announce that they are going to teach simpler steps. It is about time. People will not indefinitely pay down their perfectly good money to learn figures that go out of style before they are acquired.

Dancing teachers make a mistake in trying to teach too many different things. The average dancer has no desire to exhibit his skill before admiring spectators. When it comes to the 43rd measure of a 64 measure group of steps, he is very apt to quit, and spend future evenings in the peace and quiet of his own home.

The principal qualifications of a good railroad man nowadays are ability to talk well before the investigating committees.
