GERMANY'S REPLY MAY COME MONDAY

The most important of the past week's events of the war in Europe has been the continued retreat of the Russians and their pursuit by the Austro-German army. Just now a temporary stand may be taking place, but the prospect of further retreat is more than probable. The Teutons assert that Russia has lost 500,000 men in the last two or three weeks, but that is probably a large exaggeration. The Russians are in need of munitions and may be retiring in the hope of obtaining a supply in time to make more determined defence. They have large orders in this country and Canada. They have not been routed.

The Germans, it is said, are alarmed by the French successes in Alsace and are reinforcing their troops in that section. It is supposed, also, that they will transfer a large force from the Russian campaign to the vicinity of Arras and the Ypres. The cry at Berlin is now "On to Paris." Presumably, however, there is not much danger that the Allies will be driven from their present line of defence.

On the Dardanelles the Allies have been making a fierce drive at the Turks and have silenced some fortifications and captured some trenches. The severity of the struggle and the magnitude of the losses in men killed is something appalling, the Allies, it is said, having found 6,000 dead Turks in a line of trenches captured.

The Italians are strengthening themselves in the mountains and, it is supposed, have Trent as their aggressive objective. There has been much fighting with the Austrians, but no general battle. Perhaps the Italians do not contemplate a much farther invasion of Austrian territory and may be content to hold what they have gained, if they can add the capture of Trieste to their successes. It will probably be to the advantage of all the allied powers if Italy will send a million or more of her large fighting force against the Germans in France.

An event that may lead to further American complications with Germany occurred on Wednesday, when the U-38 German submarine torpedoed and sunk the Dominion liner Armenian, off Cornwall, England. The Armenian was a Canadian ship and was flying the British Flag. She was carrying a cargo of mules from Newport News to England. Colored Americans were, for the most part, in charge of the animals and nearly twenty of them went down with the ship. Altogether 29 lives were lost in the disaster. It will depend, it is said, whether the Armenian had been chartered by the British government, or was in the employ of a private corporation, as to Germany's responsibility to this country for the loss of American lives. If the ship was sailing under a British charter the men were taking the risk individually and there is no occasion for interference on the part of this government. The mules were contraband of war.

There are indications that the Germans are sending heavy reinforcements from the front in Poland to the west war zone in Belgium and France. The drive against the Russians is still progressing successfully.

Snow is impeding Italian operations in the mountains.

It is now reported that the German reply to Washington will be sent in three or four days.

It is ascertained that eleven American muleteers perished in the sinking of the Armenian.

SMALLWOOD

The Ladies' Aid Society of Deer Park Church met at the parsonage and had a good turn out, although most of the members were in the midst of harvesting. The society opened with the president in the chair. Singing followed by reading of the scripture and prayer by the pastor. Roll call and dues were collected. Among other business it was ordered that resolutions be written on the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Hook, which are as follows.

WHEREAS; Our Heavenly Father has in His infinite wisdom, seen fit to remove from this world to the Heavenly Home our beloved sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Hook.

RESOLVED, we the members of the Ladies' Aid Society of Deer Park M. P. Church feel the great loss that we sustain in her death, and that we recall her devotion to the church in its various institutions and her faithfulness as a member of the Ladies' Aid Society.

RESOLVED Tthat we express our sympathy with the bereaved husband and children, who have lost, for a while, a devoted wife and mother and that we commend them to a kind Heavenly Father, who doeth all things well and pray God's blessing upon them.

RESOLVED, That we have these resolutions published in our Methodist Protestant and also in the county papers, and that a copy be spread upon the minutes and one sent to the bereaved family.

ELIZABETH'S SANE FOURTH

By JANE OSBORN

ELIZABETH PRICE'S father was the chief instigator of the movement for a quiet "Fourth", in Dalesville; so Elizabeth, when the town council passed an ordinance limiting the legal celebration of the day to speeches, parades and fireworks of a quiet and unexciting kind, thought it incumbent on herself to make life as bearable as possible for as many as possible of the small boys of the neighborhood.

She began with her Sunday school class as a nucleus, and invited them to a picnic; and each and every one of them asked permission to bring a small brother or friend. Her own brother, Tom, home for a visit, promised to come for her and help her bring the children home at sunset.

Elizabeth, as soon as the morning parade was over, started out undismayed with some twenty irresponsible boys in her wake.

"Now, boys," she said as she gave each of them a flag, a paper drinking cup and a small box of provisions when they were all settled safely in the open car, "we're going to play soldiers. These are our rations. I'm the general, and I'll appoint the two boys who behave best on the way out captains to help me manage things. You know, soldiers obey, and that's what you must do."

"If we're soldiers, we can fight, can't we?" demanded Peter Dolan, the fierce light of a born warrior shining in his red-brown eyes.

"Jimmy's cat ate my singin' canary. You ought to have seen it—just two bites—"

Jimmy's placid round face darkened into a frown. "Probably the canary bothered him; it shrieked, it didn't sing," he vouchsafed. Surreptitiously he kicked Peter.

"Now, get out," exclaimed that hot-headed young man, "or I'll—"

"See here, boys," interrupted Elizabeth, "we're not going to fight, and if you act this way I'll turn around and go home this minute. Remember what I said about the captains."

Then and there, with the tact that makes a successful general, Elizabeth decided that she would appoint Jimmy and Peter, the two most unmanageable of her soldiers, captains.

The first real hitch in Elizabeth's plans came at the fork in the road. Elizabeth started on the path to the right; the two captains, voicing the opinion of the whole army, advocated the path to the left.

"Please, Miss Elizabeth," pleaded Jimmy, "there's a rock out there where the Indians used to build fires for signals. Please let's go."

And in the end Elizabeth found herself mildly following her mutinous army to the spot in the world where she least wished to be. Just a year ago today Robert Willis and she had wandered up the same path. They had stopped to rest on the famous Indian stone, and while they were there Robert had surprised Elizabeth by asking her to be his wife. She had refused him, for she had not trusted herself and had thought that the quick, warm feelings which came to her with his words would leave her. Today she realized her mistake. She had purposely brought the boys to the foot of the valley. But she had meant to walk up the path on the right side to a pretty spot where she knew she could look across the tree tops to the old Indian stone. With dismay she watched her young soldiers scampering up the hillside, and suddenly she heard a whoop of delight from Peter Dolan, the first to reach the Indian stone.

"I'm a silly, sentimental, foolish thing," said Elizabeth, wiping a few drops from her eyes, "and I just deserve every bit of this."

Putting feeling and sentiment aside, Elizabeth hurried on and overtook the boys. Then, standing on the very spot where she and Robert had stood together, she began to give instructions to her small army.

By the time this work was done the boys had lost whatever reserve they had at first felt because of unaccustomed linen collars and unnecessarily smooth hair and shining boots. Peanuts, chewing gum, candy, marbles and various other boyish treasures had made their appearance. Lunch added to their good spirits. But Elizabeth felt out of key and although usually she would have been happy at the happiness of the children and the success of the picnic, she found herself wishing for sunset. Once in a while she would steal away from the boys, playing in the woods, and wander out to the edge of the great bowlder.

"Perhaps," she mused to herself, "some silly Indian maiden once stood here watching for her Indian brave, whom she had foolishly sent away, and that's just what the silly girl deserved."

Again her eye rested on a large pine tree spread out in the valley below her. She remembered watching it sway in the breeze a year before, and she idly wondered how many tragedies and comedies it had witnessed in its old life.

The boys, in spite of their general's preoccupation, enjoyed every minute of their "sensible" Fourth. When the sun dipped suddenly below the opposite hilltops, Elizabeth breathed a sigh of relief, but the boys begged for a little more time.

"Yes," said Elizabeth, "we will wait here for my brother who's coming to take us home." "Oh," she exclaimed suddenly, "I told him the other path. Boys, won't two of you go down the path to the fork in the road and wait there for Mr. Tom? He thinks we are on the other side of the valley. I wish Captain Jimmy and Captain Peter would please go. You don't know him, do you? He's tall and looks a little like me. Just tell him Miss Elizabeth is waiting for him at the Indian stone. We'll have a game of blind man's buff till you come back."

A few minutes later Jimmy and Peter encountered Robert Willis at the fork in the road. Robert had traveled many miles that day in order to keep a melancholy sort of tryst with himself on the old Indian stone. He realized the foolishness of his action, but he had made the trip nevertheless. He had a vague, unacknowledged idea that perhaps some of Elizabeth's sweet presence might have lingered at their last meeting place.

"Hello!" said Jimmy in a conversational tone.

"Oh—" said Robert, suddenly awakened from visions of soft, shining hair blowing in the breeze.

"He's the feller," whispered Peter—"brown eyes like Miss Elizabeth, tall and all that."

"Miss Elizabeth's waiting on the Indian stone," volunteered Jimmy, and he began to lead the way up the steep path.

Robert staggered and turned white. These rosy, brown-skinned, freckled little faces belonged perhaps to sprites or brownies who were teasing him. He tried to catch one of the boys, who bounced on ahead, thinking Robert was making an attempt at some game of tag.

"I'll get ahead of them," he said, rushing past the boys with a hard set face.

At the top of the path he turned toward the Indian stone, and there in a clearing he saw Elizabeth, blind-folded, surrounded by many dancing, jumping, shouting small boys, or—for a moment Robert's heart stood still—perhaps after all they were sprites, and Elizabeth, for some fault of his, was their captive.

"Here he is, here he is, Miss Elizabeth," the boys shouted, and the next moment Robert threw himself into Elizabeth's outstretched arms.

Five minutes later Tom, tired, warm and a little cross, walked upon the scene.

"I say, Elizabeth," he called through the trees, "this is a nice way to treat an obliging brother. You told me the other path; and if these youngsters hadn't been howling like wild Indians, I'd be on the opposite side of the valley yet looking for you."

Suddenly Tom stopped. He saw Elizabeth, flushed and happy, and by her side Robert Willis, also happy, still holding the veil he had pulled from Elizabeth's bandaged eyes. The boys stood awkwardly about looking at each other.

"Well, of all the—strange happenings," chuckled Tom, taking in the situation. "I say, boys," he said, coming to his sister's rescue, "I'm Miss Elizabeth's brother. Come on; let's go home. I'll lead the way to the trolley."

"Gee;" said Jimmy, putting his hands in his pockets and throwing back his head in a superior way. "Aren't girls queer?"

"Well," said Peter, stubbing his toes against pebbles in the path, "maybe it's our fault. We caught the wrong man."

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT FOR CARROLL COUNTY, SITTING IN EQUITY.

NO. 4871 EQUITY

Cliften M. Waltz, plaintiff vs.
John W. Costly et al., defendants.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree of court for the sale of the real estate of Moses A. Costly, who died in said county intestate, in the year 1913, for the purpose of paying the claim of the plaintiff and other debts of said intestate.

The Bill of Complaint shows, that the said Moses A. Costly left his widow, Laura E. Costly, and the following Children, his only heirs at law, namely, John W., Moses, Frank W., William and Jeremiah Costly, all of whom are married and Virgie Costly, unmarried.

That said intestate left at the time of his death, two parcels of land situate in Carroll county, Maryland, containing in all 2 acres, 3 roods and 24 square perches of land.

That the estate of said intestate is indebted unto the plaintiff in the sum of $31-00, to the Westminster Savings Bank, a body corporate, in the sum of $125-00, on mortgage, and is also indebted unto Leonard Parrish, Carroll A. Parrish and Leonard Parrish, Administrator of Micha E. Parrish, in the sum of $133-25, and costs, on Judgment.

That the said intestate left no personal property, whatever, to pay his debts, and that it will be necessary to sell said real estate, to pay said debts.

That John W. Costly, Moses Costly, Myrtle Costly, his wife, Frank W. Costly, Mary Costly, his wife, Virgie Costly, Laura E. Costly, widow, William Costly and Mrs. William Costly, his wife and Carroll A. Parrish, are non residents of the State of Maryland.

It is thereupon adjudged and ordered that the Complainant by causing a copy of this order inserted in some newspaper published in Carroll county, Maryland, in one of each of four successive weeks before the 31st day of July, A. D., 1915, giving notice to the said non resident defendants of the object and substance of the Bill of Complaint and warn them to appear in this court in person or by solicitor on or before the 16th day of August next, to answer the premises and show cause, if any they have, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

OSCAR D. GILBERT,
Clerk of the Circuit Court for Carroll county.
