WE CAN BUT WON'T

In this memorandum submitted to President Wilson, Secretary of Commerce Redfield spoke of the "false doctrine of American inability to compete." There is no such doctrine, there never has been, and Mr. Redfield knows it. He has put up a straw adversary in order to make a display of knocking it down. American ingenuity, American enterprise and American labor have the ability to compete with any nation on earth, on equal terms. They can compete on equal terms, but they won't.

Now Mr. Redfield, and President Wilson, please take note of the difference. We have the ability but we haven't the inclination. The American laborer can live on the same wages and under the same conditions as the European and the Asiatic, but he won't. And we are proud of him. American industries can thrive under the same conditions as industries in countries of low-paid labor, but they won't. We are also proud of the captains of American industry.

There are some American statesmen who would like to force American labor to accept European and Asiatic standards. They tried to put that over, and as a result we had long bread lines and vast armies of unemployed in 1913-14. You think you Democrats can do that again, Mr. Redfield, but you can't. When it comes to a question of "inability," you are up against it. You simply can't put it over again.

Two in the Dark

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1915, by W. G. Chapman.)

"I'd like to see you in the library, old man," said Munson, the host, to his guest, Fremantle.

Alfred Fremantle looked rather vaguely at Munson. The middle-aged financier's voice was a little unreal; the man was flushed, not with wine so much as with good living. Munson had the best cook in Maitland, and gave the best dinners.

The house party was such as Munson loved to give. A round half-dozen of financial magnates had sat at his table. At their head Edith Munson had watched over the affairs of the table. She was a beautiful woman, even at thirty-five, and much admired. Fremantle was the only nonfinancial guest present. He was rich in his own right, and a famous traveler. He was an old friend of Edith's, too; before her marriage there had been some talk about them. Fremantle had often wondered whether Munson knew.

Munson paused irritably in the passage Voices came from the billiard room.

"All show, old man," one of his guests was saying. "Just to keep up the pretense of affection between them. Everybody knows how he's neglected her."

"I wonder whether she knows about that dancer."

"She'll know soon," answered the other.

"Do you mean to say she's going to sue?"

"So they say. Of course there's another reason."

"Fremantle?"

"He's been her shadow while Jim Munson was away."

Munson overheard the whole conversation, and his projected talk with Fremantle, which had been only vague in his mind, suddenly assumed the aspect of the irrevocable. He must end all this. He had certainly neglected Edith. But how was it known? And did they know that it was because of his suspicions of her, his assurance that her love had failed him? And that dancer, Lois Ferrand! He shrugged his shoulders contemptuously. He had met her just twice, at bachelor parties, and the smooth-faced, vapid little chit had affected him no more than a floating feather. He must end all this! A wave of blood surged into his heavy face.

"I'm ready, Munson!"

Fremantle, immaculate in his evening clothes, was standing in front of him. Munson felt taken at a disadvantage. He frowned, then said blandly:

"Come into the library. I won't keep you long, Fremantle."

It was not until he stood facing the other man beside the big fireplace that he knew Fremantle had sensed the purpose of the invitation. Munson stood with his back to the door; Fremantle watched him with a dawning sneer upon his lips.

"Now!" said Munson briskly, "what have you to say for yourself?"

"Is anything necessary, Munson?" asked the other.

"You came here as my guest—" began Munson bitterly. Then he checked himself. "No. Nothing is necessary," he answered. "But you did not know the type of man you were dealing with. You have made Mrs. Munson's name common gossip."

"That's a lie, Munson. It is yourself," answered Fremantle furiously. "Let me pass."

"You are not going to pass," said Munson. "At least, one of us is not going to leave this room."

"Heroics, eh?"

"As you will. Will you fight like a gentleman, or like a tough?"

"Oh, like a gentleman, of course," said Fremantle.

He did not stir from his position as Munson, going to the wall, flung open a cabinet and brought out two pistols. Each had a curious arrangement fixed to the muzzle. Fremantle looked at them curiously.

"You mean it, Munson? May I ask what purpose these contrivances serve? To catch the bullet?"

"Silencers," said Munson briefly. He threw open the French windows. "The winner steps out upon the lawn and gets away. You will have no difficulty. I have arranged my affairs. There is a train in twenty minutes. One shot apiece, at a yard's distance, in a darkened room."

"You seem to have thought it all out," said Fremantle, sneering still. "But before you begin, you may as well know—"

"Are you ready?" demanded Munson. He saw his enemy's face whiten. He was surprised at his own resolution. Fremantle let the muzzle of his weapon drop irresolutely, but Munson held his own covering the other.

"I shall switch off the light," he continued. "We will wait until the clock begins to chime the hour. Then we will fire together."

"You may as well listen to reason," suggested Fremantle.

Munson's hand went out and snapped the switch. The room was in complete darkness. The two men faced each other, but each could see nothing. Neither could hear the other breathe. Munson wondered if his pistol still covered his enemy.

There was a minute still, and out of the darkness came the voice of Fremantle.

"You may as well listen, Munson," he said. "It won't prevent your shooting. Mrs. Munson knew that you had ceased to care for her. She did all in her power to win your love. At last I discovered what the trouble was. You know we were like brother and sister in the old days."

Munson set his teeth and strained his ears for the chime. His pistol did not waver in his hand.

"I suggested the scheme, Munson. I told her that you were not a bad sort of man, that if you realized what you might lose you would feel differently. I designed to make you jealous; but I did not mean anyone else to see. That's all."

"You lying hound!" snarled Munson. And at that instant he heard the quaver of the clock as it prepared to chime, and pressed the trigger.

There came no echo to the muffled thud of the discharge. For a fearful instant he hesitated. Had he killed Fremantle? He strained his ears, but could hear nothing save the clock striking.

"Have you fired?" he demanded as the chimes subsided.

There was no response. Nervously he stretched out his hand and switched on the light. Fremantle stood quite still, watching him, his pistol drooping in his hand.

"If that's all, Munson—" he began.

Munson dashed his pistol down and burst into tears from the reaction.

"You've had your triumph, curse you!" he whimpered. "My life's yours. Why didn't you shoot? Why didn't you? I'm going—"

He stepped out through the windows. He was going away. Fremantle had won; he had refused to shoot when he could have killed him. Doubtless he meant to make the most of his triumph, and life meant more to him under the circumstances than it would if he were a murderer and a fugitive.

At the edge of the lawn Munson hesitated and looked back. Fremantle was still in the library. He stood beneath the light of the electric bulb. He had wrapped a handkerchief about his hand and laid the pistol away. As Munson watched him he saw the door open and his wife appear upon the threshold.

Munson had never spied upon his wife, but at the sight of her a madness rose in his brain. Fremantle would tell her of his triumph. A love scene was imminent. Why should he not kill them both?

He acted upon the thought. He crept toward the window again, halting in the shadow of a tall cypress outside. As he did so he saw the pistol that Fremantle had laid down. It lay hidden from his wife's view, but plain in Munson's sight, behind a pile of books upon the library table. And Munson remembered that it had not been discharged.

His hand went out toward it, but was arrested by his wife's words.

"Where's Jim?" she asked.

"I think he has stepped outside," said Fremantle, unconcernedly.

Edith Munson hesitated, looked at Fremantle. Then she put her hands to her face and began to sob softly.

"I can't bear it any longer," she said. "Harry, it has failed. He doesn't care for me. You can't win love by any such trick as that. He is tired of me, Harry."

"No," said Fremantle, bravely. "It was a misunderstanding on both sides."

She looked up quickly. "You have been talking with him!" she cried. "How do you know that? How do you know?"

Fremantle stood before her. "Edith," he said, "tell me one thing: Do you love your husband?"

"With all my heart and soul," she answered.

The fingers of the man outside, which were groping for the pistol, fell as if palsied to his side. He shrank back from the window as Fremantle came out. Fremantle turned, and their eyes met.

"Harry!" Jim Munson began.

"Go to her," said Fremantle, seeing that he had overheard.

"Harry, I wronged you. Will you forgive? A man doesn't often have such a friend, and to wrong him—"

Their hands met. "Go to her," Fremantle answered, and strode swiftly across the lawn in the direction of the railroad station.

It's pretty dull time when the politicians can't look out and see the regular daily crisis coming along that is going to disrupt the republic.
