DAIRY

WOODEN BLOCKS FIND FAVOR

Ideal for Paving Floors of Dairy Barns —Coal Tar Creosote Adds Much to Durability.

(By B. O. LONGYEAR, Colorado Agricultural College, Fort Collins, Colo.)

Pavements made of wood blocks are no new thing—in fact, they were extensively used a generation ago in the principal timber-producing regions of the country. They were usually composed of round blocks set on end and the spaces filled with sand. While excellent when new, they soon wore out in places by the decay of some of the blocks, which left the pavement rough and full of holes, unless frequently repaired.

Substitutes such as stone, brick and asphalt have largely replaced wood for pavements, while concrete has come into use for ground floors in stable and dairy barns. The desirable qualities of wood, however, which these substitutes largely lack, have again brought the wooden block into favor. Thus, it is more quiet, it is not so slippery and is less trying to the feet and legs of animals than are most of its substitutes.

Its lack of durability is now overcome by treating the blocks with coal tar creosote, and the blocks are cut square or rectangular so that there are no large openings between them.

For dairy barns, creosoted wood blocks laid on a concrete foundation are found to produce an almost ideal floor, and one that is lasting and sanitary as well.

PROPER COOLING FOR CREAM

Attention Must Be Given Just as Soon as Separated—Dampened Blankets Lower Temperature.

Now that warm weather is approaching, every possible means must be taken to get cream on the market in good condition. The warm days that have already passed have had a marked effect in lowering the quality of cream now being made into butter.

Attention must first be paid to cooling the cream just as soon as separated. However, the greatest exposure to heat usually comes when the cream is hauled to market, and the cans are left uncovered and exposed to the hot sun and dust.

It has been found by experiment that the temperature may be kept more than 20 degrees lower when dampened blankets are thrown over the can or dampened blankets are used than when the cans are left uncovered. In addition, the dirt and dust are kept away from the cans and cream.

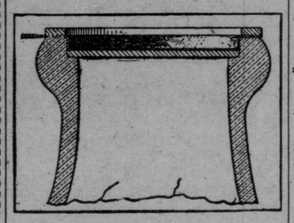

It is not only to the advantage of the producer to help in keeping up the quality of the cream so that good prices may continue, but low-grade cream cannot be allowed to come upon the market in the future.

KEEP A MILK BOTTLE CLEAN

Closure, Invented by Terre Haute Man, Is More Sanitary Than Ordinary Pasteboard Disk.

The Scientific American in illustrating and describing a bottle closure, invented by R. E. Redding of Terre Haute, Ind., says:

The invention provides a closure which is more sanitary than the ordinary pasteboard disk. This is due to the provision of a cloth strip which forms an auxiliary closure member and prevents dirt and dust from entering the bottle while the main closure member is being removed. It also provides a device having a closure of the type described which may be readily taken off or applied to the bottle.

BEST RATION FOR DAIRY COW

Much Rough Feed in Form of Hay and Silage Must Be Supplied—Also Give Her Grain.

The good dairy cow is a large eater and drinker. She has a large stomach and must consume large amounts of feeds daily to fill the milk pail at every milking during the year. She must eat till she is full and content to lie in the stall or pasture and chew her cud.

Much rough feed in the form of hay and silage must be included in her daily ration. Also she must have some rich or heavy feeds such as grain or meal. The total amount of feed she should receive daily or at a single feed will depend somewhat upon the amount of milk she is giving, or capable of giving. While she is giving her heaviest flow of milk she should have a rather heavy grain or concentrated ration in addition to the bulky matter.

NUMBER EIGHT

By ELLIS DERBY.

"It's too near the prow of the boat, Aunt Catherine," Dora protested, when they had followed the luggage-laden porter up two flights of stairs and had landed at No. 8, a stateroom, the fourth from the forward smoking room. "And, dear, there'll be all the smoke, too. You can't stand it."

"Yes, I can, too. Just lay those things right in the berth." Miss Winthrop turned her flushed, beaming face on her assembled relatives. "Where's Phil? I don't dare to let him out of my sight."

Her brother, Phil's father, and Phil's two sisters and Phil's mother all eagerly assented.

"Not for a minute, Catherine, until you see him safely in Gregory's hands," said Mr. Harding.

"Now, Frank, you were young once yourself," began Mrs. Harding. On the outskirts of the "family gathering" stood Phil. He was being consigned now to New York, in care of Aunt Catherine, to another uncle, and from there to South America to learn commercial conditions in the export trade.

Phil tried to see the crowd down on the dock through the side door leading out on deck. She might be there some place. It couldn't be that she didn't care a rap what became of him.

Phil stood with his chin up, hating the world at large, wishing with all his heart he dared leap over the side of the boat before them all. But what was the use? She wasn't down there. Not a single line had come from her in days and days.

"We can go on deck, now, Phil," Aunt Caroline was saying.

Aunt Caroline pretended to settle herself in her chair. And after Phil had disappeared, there came cautiously across the deck to her side a girl. She was very young and very anxious and wistful as she sat on the edge of the chair next to the old lady and listened to her.

"Oh, you must have known I'd be sure to come after I got your letter!" she exclaimed once. "Why—why, I love Phil terribly. I had no idea they were sending him away like that."

Miss Winthrop eyed her pleasantly.

"Real sweet, sightly sort of girl," she said, half to herself. "Well, my dear, Boston families are given to strange notions. They wanted Phil to wait till he was settled in business, I suppose, before he thought of marrying."

"But that's all wrong. Phil needs me now while he's trying to make good."

"Pity sake, child, don't cry before folks," said the old lady, hastily producing a large linen handkerchief. "Yes, I understand all about it. That's why I sent for you."

"And Phil doesn't know."

"He won't know, either. You're going to share No. 8 with me tonight, and tomorrow morning when my other brother arrives to meet us I shall just surprise him and Phil, too. You see, Phil's a dear, good boy, but I've always wondered about his backbone."

"His backbone?"

"Oh, I mean his nerve, his gumption. He shouldn't let the family bundle him off to South America as if he was a two-year-old. So I want to hear if he'll stand up against Gregory, my other brother. If he does, I'm going to let him have you, and I'll start him in business myself and have an eye on you both. But if he doesn't, we'll let him sail for South America with Gregory, all alone."

Not a suspicion did Phil have. Aunt Catherine decided she'd retire early, and he walked the deck alone thinking of Marjorie, the girl back in Boston who hadn't cared enough for him to even come down and see him off.

And suddenly out of the night there loomed the dark hull of a big schooner, bound from Maine with lumber.

Phil was thrown to the deck by the shock, but got up and made for the side where No. 7 was. Confusion was everywhere, people pouring out of staterooms, the boat's officers calling out, the men on the schooner shouting, but he reached No. 8, and stood in horror before its splintered wreck. The point of the bowsprit had jammed through, crushing and smashing the berths and side.

"My aunt's in there!" he gasped. Then across the way, in No. 9, the stateroom door opened and Aunt Catherine stood, wrapped in a serviceable black silk traveling kimono. And beyond her, in a blue kimono, Phil thought he saw a ghost—Marjorie with wide, frightened eyes, and parted lips.

"Pity's sake, Phil, I thought we was wrecked sure," began the old lady. "Ran into something, didn't we?"

"How did you get here?" was all Phil could say, reaching for Marjorie's clinging fingers. "I thought Aunt Catherine was in No. 8, and that's wrecked."

"Well, so it is," said Miss Winthrop placidly. "Good thing we didn't sleep there. I don't like to make mistakes, but we must have got into the wrong stateroom. So you found out sooner than I expected, Phil."

Phil stepped into the stateroom and took Marjorie in his arms. The old lady watched them happily.

"What shall I tell Gregory in the morning when you two run up after your marriage license?"

"Tell him I won't go to South America for the whole family," answered Phil. "We don't care about the rest, do we, Marjorie, as long as we've got Aunt Catherine."
