The Quick Asset

By

MAY DALLARMAND

(Copyright, 1916, by W. G. Chapman.)

"Sorry, Mr. Walters, but my orders are definite—you must pay the bill within 48 hours or I shall have to close you up."

"You are subjecting me to a severe hardship, sir."

Mr. Thomas Biggs, senior partner of Biggs, Bluett & Co., opened eyes and palms expansively, shrugged his shoulders, arose from his seat and took up his hat.

"You are asking of me impossibilities," spoke Sidney Walters. "Every dollar I have in the world is invested in this business. Actual orders far overplus my liabilities. In another month we will have not only a free deck, but a surplus. I beg of you to alter your hard decision."

"Business is business," spoke the other blandly. "The house went all over your case before I left the city. You owe us $2,000. It is 30 days past due. Our rules are invariable. I came down here to look into affairs. I find that your quick assets are shy over 40 per cent, where in every healthy business they should stand in the proportion of two to one as to active debts, I find almost the reverse. What in the world ever made you bulk all your capital in fixed assets? It is ruinous. It means slow liquidation in case of a failure. Commercially your business proposition is not solvent. We shall have to have our money by Saturday morning or file a bill for an accounting."

"Which means ruin for me," said Walters drearily. "If you would give me time to go to the city and apply to some of the banks—"

"Impossible. You would have to delay me here for several days, and my time is precious. Can you not get your friends here to assist you?"

"I am practically a stranger," replied Sidney in a low, strained tone, "and the community, as you know, is a poor one."

Sidney, indeed, spoke the truth. When he determined to start in business—the manufacturing of fine contact metal points for intricate vehicle equipment—he had discounted the elements of bulk as to shipments. An abandoned plant at Acton was offered for a mere song. He purchased it. He paid cash for his machinery outfit and overbought as to raw material.

It was with a great sense of comfort that he finally opened the little factory, giving employment to some 20 men. Expenses and wages were low. It was true that Acton was 20 miles from a railroad. It did not even boast an automobile. The town was isolated—shut in to itself—but once a week a slow lumbering side-wheel steamer came up from the city with passengers and freight and took back the product of the plant, packed in neat boxes, not many of them, for the points brought a high price, were manufactured under an exclusive patent and sold readily.

Sidney had settled down to a humdrum routine, glad to be apart from the jar and bustle of the city. He figured out a growing business based upon light overhead expense. His help was not overworked; he was modest in his style of living. He brought work and comfort to many a poor workman. His ambition was satisfied.

And now, suddenly, terrifically alarming, came the advent of Biggs. Many a time Sidney had realized that he was straining his credit, but the orders ahead were sure future income. The plant and equipment represented solid values. He had not been business man enough to comprehend that the ironclad rules of business demanded quick assets that could be swiftly realized on in case of exigency.

Mr. Biggs left for his hotel. Sidney sank into a chair dejectedly. He caught the echo of a sob in the next room and went to its open doorway and peered in. His office girl sat leaning over her typewriter, a handkerchief applied to her eyes.

"Will you please let me go home, Mr. Walters?" pleaded Arline Tracey. "I—I have a dreadful headache."

"Surely," acquiesced Sidney. "Something has come up where we will suspend business for a day or two."

He watched her dainty form and colorless face sadly as Arline left the office. It was of her and the workmen he was thinking. If he had to give up business what would they all do. For the girl he had always felt a great interest. She was an orphan, living with some relatives in the village and had come to him asking for employment the day the plant had opened.

He had told her kindly that there was little bookkeeping to do, he could run a typewriter himself and had planned to start out on an economical basis. Arline had told him that she required a very small salary, as her father had left her an investment in the city which brought her a cash return each six months. She would "grow up with the business;" she could surely be of some service to him, and Sidney hired her.

Since then he had been glad of it. Arline proved a treasure. She took an interest in every detail of the business. She seemed happiest when the work was hardest and most pressing.

The man from whom Sidney had purchased the plant was wealthy. Sidney wondered if he could not get him to help him out. He went late that afternoon to his home, to find that he had gone to visit a farm he owned at some distance and would not return until the following evening.

Was it fate, or did a sense of regard for Arline, the longing of a lonely, troubled man influence Sidney to lessen his pace as he neared the house where Arline lived? She happened to be at the gate. He was glad to be invited into a cozy parlor. Arline was cheerful, anxious to entertain him. A little elf of a fellow—her cousin—prattled about Arline's pet carrier pigeon.

"She sent it away today," he confided to Sidney, and Arline flushed hotly and had to explain that it was through this medium that she regularly corresponded with a very dear girl friend in the distant city.

Sidney met with a severe disappointment the next evening when he called on the man from whom he hoped to secure a loan. The latter had no ready funds. Sidney longed to stop for another pleasant evening at the home of Arline, but it was late as he reached the house. He passed restless hours alone at nome and consequently overslept himself the next morning.

"What is this?" he voluntarily exclaimed, as entering the office the first thing that attracted his eye was a signed receipt in full from the Biggs firm.

"Mr. Biggs left it," explained Arline, and flushed and paled, and began to tremble.

"Why, I don't understand this!"

"I paid it," confessed Arline, almost pleadingly. "Oh, Mr. Walters, don't be cross about it, please! I overheard you talking about quick assets. I sent a quick message to my friend in the city and got my investment changed into a certified check, and the carrier dove brought it safely here, and I paid Mr. Biggs," and Arline broke down there under the intense strain of the moment. The astonished Sidney stared at her, spellbound.

Arline had saved the day. Arline had won the heart of a true man. And the outcome of the episode was life's noblest, most treasured asset—mutual love.

Hypnotizing Animals.

Hypnotizing a hen is a trick known to most country boys. It is an old experiment, first described by the Jesuit father, Athanasius Kircher, who laid a hen on a table, held it firmly for a little while, and drew a chalk line in front of its eyes, with the result that it remained as if in catalepsy.

In India it is known that a cobra caught by the neck and gently pressed will soon become stiff and remain so for a considerable time. A frog fastened to a board and turned suddenly upside down goes into a trance.

If you pick up a crab and wave it in the air it becomes immobile, a female bending her legs over her abdomen, a male sticking them out straight. The same is true of the fresh-water crawfish.

Among the insects "death-feigning" is common, and is often a means of saving the life of the insect.

The hypnotic condition is induced in man by suggestion of physical inhibition, but in both cases sensatory stimuli may assist. These stimuli may be optic (fixing the gaze on some object) or tactile (stroking the skin) or otherwise.

Archer's Advantages.

The eye cannot, of course, follow the progress of a bullet, and the rifleman may miss his game by the measure of one foot or five, yet never know the amount of his error. But the flight of the most swiftly sent arrow may be easily followed, and a "close" miss gives the shooter a self congratulatory thrill almost equaling the happiness of a center hit. There is a gratification in watching a shaft flash past the head of a justly indignant, much-astonished squirrel. And there is real excitement, too, in watching a steel-pointed arrow leap into the blue, there narrowly failing to intercept that rogue of the woods, the heavily flying crow. The archer's great advantage rests in the comparative silence with which his hunting may be carried on. A shot means the soft twang of a bowstring and the low whisper of an arrow—and these sounds seldom greatly frighten game.—Outing
