My Dear Children

It seems as though the distance between The Boulders & this has been widely increased since I gave up to Clinton the end of the correspondence and now that I never see him except to say "How are you? is there anything I can do for you?" as he hurries off to the early car from a hurried breakfast, I find the privation of letters too great. I have of course no opportunity for conference with E whose time will be thus fully occupied during the coming six months, from the hour he rises till a late one at night. I had thought the arrangement for him to lodge and get his breakfast at 1033 would be a convenience to himself and you both, and a great comfort to
