EASTVIEW

Mr. George Caple has resigned his position as teacher of Eastview school in favor of Miss Elsie Conaway, as duties on the farm require his attention.

We find that slaughtering of hogs in this vicinity has again been revived, as Mr. Charles Wicks, of this place, killed 3, and Mr. Louis Schnabel, of Louisville, the past week.

Those who have purchased new autos do not have very good roads to practice on.

Mr. John Conaway is contemplating building a garage but is rather slow getting at it owing to the cold weather.

Mr. Ernest Glover, who has been sick with measles is slowly improving.

Mrs. Maggie Conaway who has been housed with a severe cold is not much better.

We are sorry to hear that Mr. Norris Caple is so very ill and hope his condition will soon improve.

Sunday, Mr. and Mrs. John Conaway entertained, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wick, Miss Ethel Hoffman, Harriet Jones and Lona Ward.

Mr. Earl Lovell and family spent Sunday with his wife's people, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Jones.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Little were guests of Mr. and Mrs. John Hoffman, on Sunday last.

P. O. S. of A. will hold a special meeting, February 6th, 7.30 P. M. Installation and initiation of new members. All please turn out.

A Calico Girl

By VICTOR REDCLIFFE

(Copyright, 1919 by the Western Newspaper Union.)

"Good-by till next year, little Doris!" hailed Sidney Throop from the old-fashioned carryall, conveying himself and three fellow vacationers from camp to the little railroad depot.

He waved his hand in kindly farewell at the forlorn figure of a girl of sixteen, Doris Lee, who stood at the rustic gate of her uncle's home. She smiled bravely, then turned her head away, and Paul Faber, at the side of Throop, noticing a fluttering handkerchief, remarked:

"I declare! That little sprite is sorry to have you leave—she's crying."

"I am sorry myself," replied Sidney gravely. "It has been a pleasure to know such an unspoiled child of nature."

"She hasn't been the same since yesterday—seems to have avoided the crowd for some reason or other."

"I can tell you why," piped in another. "She looked positively awed when Faber's sister stopped at the camp in her automobile. I suppose the poor little wild flower was stunned at the magnificence of the acknowledged belle of the season."

So the episode passed, but Sidney Throop sat silent and thoughtful. Their camp had been located in close proximity to the farm owned by the uncle of Doris, and it had been her task to bring fresh milk and cream morning and evening to the temporary sojourners. An artless, innocent child, she had the good fortune to deal with real gentlemen, and as the days ran on grew to regard them as true friends.

"If I am to do the extra chores of carrying milk and eggs and chickens to the picnickers," said Doris to her uncle the next day, you must allow me a little pin money."

"Why not?" interrogated Mr. Lee good naturedly. "But I hope seeing these gay people from the city hasn't put a lot of vanity into that sensible little head of yours."

Ever since the day she had met the fashionable Miss Anice Faber there had become a model established in the mind of Doris as to what the real lady of society should look like.

"I suppose Mr. Thorpe made some wide comparisons between that silk-and-lace beauty and humble little me in calico," mused Doris, and naturally a trifle bitterly, and then a change came over her. She nurtured a species of reserve and every penny of pin money she acquired she put carefully away. Gradually her wardrobe began to include little articles of feminine adornment dear to the girlish heart.

A year had rolled around and Mr. Lee informed Doris that "the crowd of young fellows," as he termed it, had advised him that they would take the old camp cottage for a month.

Doris was in a bewildering state of animation. For a full year she had dreamed, planned and saved. It almost took away the breath of the poor vacationers when there burst upon their vision the afternoon of their arrival a new and glorified Doris.

She wore a silky, scaly dress skirt, quite "vampish," having a certain trailing arbutus effect. It fitted like the fuzz of a clingstone peach. Her breath came quick, her eyes glowed like diamonds, but as the four young men greeted her friendly enough, but vaguely, Doris shivered. Somehow she traced not only surprise in their faces, but a certain reproachful, pitying sentiment.

The unusual gravity of Thorpe crushed her. The young face clouded when she had ascertained what supplies they would require daily from the farmhouse. Doris hastened from the camp, reached a covert, and threw herself on the ground in a wild paroxysm of vexation and disappointment.

"What is the trouble, little friend?" spoke Sidney, who had followed her, and she came to her feet angry and defiant. She darted one look at him and fled precipitately. To both a correct conception had come. Sidney at once comprehended that the foolish little maid had modeled herself after Miss Faber to appear modern and impressive, and she realized that she must appear grotesque and out of her element, and her vanity was wounded. Like some penitent she appeared at the camp in propria personae the following morning, her own modest natural self. She was reserved and looked pained and humbled. Sidney accompanied her as she started home.

"Dear little friend," he spoke almost tenderly, "it seems good to see the bright fairy we all of us love once again as nature intended her."

"And I did it all for you!" sobbed Doris. "Miss Faber—"

"Miss Faber, confidentially, has wrinkles to conceal, and none of your lovely roses on her cheeks," observed Sidney.

"But I am only a calico girl, and I thought that if I was dressed like Miss Faber—"

"Made up, you mean," interrupted Sidney. "You don't need that." He could scarcely resist the impulse to take her in his arms in all her artless grace and beauty. "Doris, dear," he said seriously, "there is one man who always wishes to find you as you are—a sweet child of nature—one who hopes some day to have you as all his own—myself."

And she read truth and adoration in his earnest, longing eyes, and was content.

IN MEMORIAM

In sad but loving remembrance of my dear loving aunt, Mrs. Janie Arbaugh, who left us six years ago January 20, 1914.

You don't seem dead to me, dear aunt,
But, as a star unseen,
I often feel that you are very near
Though death intrudes between.

Affliction sore, so long you bore,
Physicians were in vain;
So God, in pity looked down from above,
And called you Home, from your pain.

By her niece Mrs. Gussie Blizzard.

Sleep on dear aunt, and take your rest,
God called you home. He thought it best,
He saw your sufferings here so great,
And called you through His pearly gate.

By her niece and nephews, Emerson H. H. Palmer, Ollie and Charlotte Blizzard.

Some one suggests suspending the Congressional Record, but how can the women of Westminster clean house without this good substantial paper to put under the parlor carpets?
