1887 [redacted] Emily Hollingsworth Incoming Mail 1424

but as if it might be a surface piece. So you see dear Cousin we are again in hopes that something valuable will turn up. Charley is very much delighted with a farm which he saw near Bridgewater - he staid there one night and he thinks if they will take boarders that will be the best place for Deedie to stay. When he would be away, he would feel better satisfied to have her there than at the hotel in Bridgewater. We are still somewhat uncertain about their movements. Do not mention about our hopes of this proving to be any thing until you hear more from us about it dear Cousin. Charley is of course hunting around for something anything that he can find that will yield an income. I was just about to write to you dear Cousin to ask you if you felt well enough to try another journey, and if so to challenge you to join them in Baltimore next week and go with them. I was however a little afraid that the journey might be too much for you, and am very glad that you spoke candidly about how you felt - for much as they would love to have you with them, they would not like you to run any risk of overfatigue to yourself. I do not know how to thank you for wanting to send one of the girls - but you must remember dear Cousin it would not be the same expense as your own trip there, because you would have your own board elsewhere in addition. The board up there