A KINDLY FRESHET

By T. B. ALDERSON

(Copyright, 1920, Western Newspaper Union)

Jabez Arnold had closed his general store at 10 o'clock as was usually his custom. The group of evening loungers had departed, the front door was locked, but he made no move to proceed up stairs where he lived with his family. His son and helper, Gregory, yawned wearily.

"Going to wait?" he inquired.

"Yes, this is Thursday night, you know."

"That's so—Morton Bridges?"

The father nodded assentingly. The son dozed in his chair. He was aroused by a sharp tap at the rear door.

"Make yourself scarce," spoke the father. "Bridges don't like to have anybody around when he comes after his weekly supplies," and old Jabez proceeded to the rear door.

He opened it to disclose a man of perhaps thirty, although his trampish attire and neglected beard made him look ten years older.

"It's you Bridges, is it?" propounded Jabez, but his visitor simply nodded an assent that was wordless. The storekeeper accepted a written sheet of paper which the visitor had placed on the counter with two capacious baskets. He stood like a statue until Jabez had filled the long written order, packed the articles and figured up their price. Bridges paid his bill and left the place as silently as he had come.

For two years, every Thursday of the week Morton Bridges, hermit, had gone through this same unvaried performance. Hot or cold, rain or snow, he had never missed that weekly visit to the store. No one had ever been present there except Jabez, only a few of the villagers had seen that ghost-like figure steal into the town.

Morton Bridges was a promising young business man when he fell in love with Naomi Brill. For six months they were seen together, then all of a sudden because of a trivial lover's quarrel there was a separation. The local newspaper one day announced the prospective marriage of Miss Brill to one Bradley Wayne. The next day Morton Bridges sold out his business and disappeared.

It was some time before his friends learned of his whereabouts. Then a man who had been hunting told of coming across the fugitive, the exile on Waverly island, a small body of land situated in the middle of a branch of the turbulent Black river. The discoverer of the missing man had hailed Bridges at a distance, but the latter had made no acknowledgment of the greeting and had disappeared within a small lightly constructed hut where he had isolated himself. Bridges had shut himself off from the world completely. His only contact with it was when he visited the store of Jabez Arnold to purchase household necessities to add to his rather restricted menu of fish and game.

It was destined, however, that this regular system was to be disturbed. He did not appear at the general store the Thursday following that just described. Again Jabez Arnold and his son sat up to meet him. They even remained on duty an hour beyond the prescribed time. Then sleepy-headed Gregory crossly suggested that they had done their full duty.

"Yes," acquiesced the father. "It's the floods, Gregory. They say the Black river is a roaring torrent, and the island pretty near out of sight."

This was not literally true, but the sweeping waters, fed by a period of phenomenal rains, the daily encroachment upon the island had made it dangerous for Bridges to leave the lonely spot he called home. Then came the climax. The water had for some days flooded the lower part of the hut, and he had been forced to cook his meals on a high spot beyond the sight of the cabin. Nights, however, he slept in a sort of garret space formed by the roof rafters of his circumscribed dwelling. He awoke one night with the shock of a jar. He lifted himself on the rude mattress across the rafter.

"Afloat!" he commented, peering through a break in the roof. With incredible rapidity the frail hut was being borne along the swollen stream. Darkness and devastation surrounded him. The framework was holding together stanchly, although at times it was whirled about in the maelstrom rush and havoc like a feather in a whirlpool.

Bridges enlarged the hole in the roof so as to be ready to trust to his powers of swimming if collapse came. Hours ensued, miles were covered. He was lulled somewhat because outside of frequent collisions with other floating objects, no real disaster resulted. Half-asleep finally, he was conscious of the hut being tossed up and forward. It collapsed and, driven senseless, he lay on dry land, amid its ruins.

It was broad daylight and the sun was shining down on his face as he recovered sensibility. A woman stood over him.

"Morton Bridges!" she spoke in a bewildered gasp. "How came you here? I must run and tell my niece, Naomi. She has been living with me since her mother died."

"Naomi?" repeated Bridges vaguely. "You mean Mrs. Bradley Wayne?"

"What gave you that idea! Naomi is not married. Did some one make you think so? Is that why you disappeared? Oh, she will be glad to see you."

She was—so glad that, after a mutual explanation, Morton Bridges proceeded to get back to civilization—and love.
