LICERAL FEEDS BEST FOR FATTENING HOGS

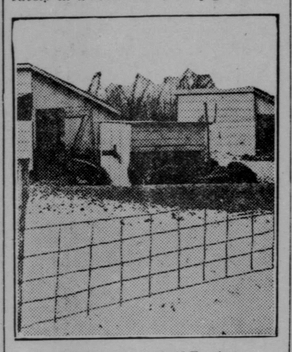

Gains in Weight Should Be Made as Rapidly as Possible.

Self-Feeding Is Most Satisfactory Method, While Hogging Saves Labor of Gathering Grain and Hauling It to Pigs.

Liberal feeding should be the rule when fattening hogs. To minimize the risk of loss from disease and to cut the labor cost, gains in weight should be made as rapidly as possible. The greatest gains are made in the least time by self-feeding, consequently this method is the most satisfactory for fattening.

These are the views of E. F. Ferrin of University farm, St. Paul, in charge of the swine production section of the animal husbandry division.

"Corn and tankage," says Mr. Ferrin, "are two of the cheapest and best fattening feeds. If each is given separately in a self-feeder, the pigs can select the amount of tankage they need. Instead of using a heavy allowance of the supplementary feed, the tankage necessary to make a hundred pounds gain is usually less than hand feeding. Hogging down corn is a variation of the self-feeding plan. It saves the labor of gathering the grain and hauling it to the pigs, but as a rule the hogs are not fat enough to market out of the cornfield but need finishing in dry lots.

Fall Pigs at a Self-Feeder.

"Salt is both a desirable addition to the ration and a poison for hogs. Care should be taken to avoid salt poisoning by gradually accustoming the pigs to the compound. When used to it, one of the best methods of supplying salt is to furnish the compressed blocks so commonly bought for cattle.

"To finish necessary to market hogs advantageously depends upon the demands of the market. Just now weights around 250 pounds are most acceptable. Not so much lard is wanted as in former years, consequently shorter feeding periods and less finish is the best plan.

MINIATURE BRIDGE BIG HELP

Seven-Foot Model of Reinforced Concrete Structure Built to Aid Solving Problem.

A model of a reinforced concrete arch bridge seven feet long has been constructed by the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, to determine just how masonry arch briges should be designed when built on a skew. A skew bridge is one in which the roadway is not perpendicular to the abutments, as when a bridge crosses a stream diagonally.

It has been found that the stresses in a skewed bridge are considerably different from those in a bridge of the same span built perpendicular to the abutments, and failures have occurred because this was not taken into account in the design.

The problem is so complicated that engineers of the bureau wish to check up their theoretical conclusions by making a faithful reproduction of a bridge, using similar materials and of such size that it can be tested in the laboratory.

Loads will be applied to the model, and the stresses at various places calculated from measurements of the lengthening and shortening of the concrete surface taken with very precise instruments as well as by other methods.

LIME CORRECTS ACID SOILS

Material Provides Available Calcium and Makes Manures and Fertilizers Effective.

Limestone corrects acidity in sour soils, provides available calcium to crops, makes manures and fertilizers more effective to the soils, favors bacterial growth and thus makes plant food more available, helps control certain plant diseases and insects and in time improves the texture of heavy soils.

ORGANIC MATTER DEFICIENT

Some Old Lands After Years of Cropping Require Application of Ground Limestone.

Some old farming lands after years of cropping have become deficient in organic matter and humus and so deficient in lime that alfalfa will not start and grow successfully until the soil is fertilized and the acidity corrected by the application of lime or ground limestone.

Valuable White Oak and Other Timber formerly belonging to the late David J. W. Earhart, situated near Union Mills, Carroll County, Maryland.

The undersigned will offer and sell as owner, on

at 1 o'clock, p. m., on the ground, at public auction, the right to cut and remove the valuable and desirable timber, principally white oak, on the two following tracts of land situated near Union Mills, Carroll county, in the State of Maryland, convenient to public and state roads and formerly owned by the late David J. W. Earhart and now the property of the undersigned, that is to say:

1. The undersigned will first offer and sell the growing timber, known as the "Silver Mine Woods," containing 51 acres and 15 perches of land, more or less, as recently surveyed. This tract of woodland is situated on the north side of the Deep Run public road, adjoining the lands formerly owned by Rebecca Earhart and others, and is covered with fine timber, principally white oak.

2. In the next place, the undersigned will offer and sell all that tract of wood land lying chiefly on the south side of the Deep Run public road, and containing 46 acres, 2 roods and 39 perches of land more or less, as recently surveyed. This woodlot lies along the public road and contains some of the finest timber, chiefly white oak, in the county.

These woodlots offer one of the finest opportunities ever presented and all lie within two miles of Union Mills, Carroll county, Maryland, and are accessible to the market.

The timber rights on the two lots will be first offered separately and then as a whole and sold to the best advantage. If sold separately, each purchaser will have two years from the first of April, 1923, for the removal of the timber; and if one purchaser buys both lots he will have three years from the first day of April, 1923, for the removal of the timber.

A deposit of $750.00 on each lot, or $1,500.00, if both wood-rights are bought by one purchaser, will be required in the form of cash or certified check on the day of sale, and the residue of the purchase price must be paid before any timber is cut and not later than six months from the day of sale.

The purchaser or purchasers will be required to sign a contract in a form to be approved by the undersigned attorneys, a copy of which will be exhibited on the day of sale, or may be seen at the office of the attorneys.

The Due Process of Law

By H. IRVING KING

(©, 1922, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

"Frank," said Elihu Goodwin, corporation lawyer, to his confidential clerk, "I have a mission of a rather private nature which I want you to undertake—just to oblige me; it's hardly business. Years ago, when naturally I was younger than I am now and a trifle more foolish, I had a rather intimate acquaintance named Reginald Fontain. We belonged to a speedy set, I am afraid."

The lawyer turned toward the window and gazed unseeingly out over the city; a reminiscent look came into his usually immobile face.

"Regy had plenty of money in those days," he continued, "and went the pace. I saw little of him after I married, for I put away childish things, and now—well I am fairly prosperous and a sober citizen. But Regy, although he married, kept stepping on the gas. I have heard he went through his own fortune and his wife's, too. Some say she died of a broken heart. However, for years I had heard nothing of Reginald Fontain until today I got a letter from him.

"It's a barely disguised begging letter. Now, I want you to investigate and see just how the land lies. I wouldn't mind helping him a little if it would do him any good—if he really needed help. If I went to see him personally at first—well, it might be awkward, for I can't do much for him. I really can't afford to. But you go and see and report to me. Then I'll know just what to do."

Now, Elihu Goodwin was rich and, as they say down East, "mighty nigh." He never did like to meet poor people and the dislike had grown upon him with the years. Still, Goodwin felt that he could not entirely disregard Fontain's appeal. There stirred in him vague recollections of financial transactions in the dim past in which Elihu had been the beneficiary of Reginald—borrowed and forgotten sums. Frank made the visit as requested by his employer and found the shattered wreck of him who had once been the gay and reckless Reginald Fontain reclining in an easy chair in a cheap flat. The young man explained to him that "important business had prevented Mr. Goodwin," etc., and he had sent him (Frank) "to ascertain how he (Goodwin) could be of assistance," etc.

Fontain at once launched forth into a rambling tale of woe, the only salient facts of which appeared to be that both Reginald's finances and Reginald's liver were in a sadly demoralized condition. While he was rambling on a door opened and a light footstep was heard. "Ah," said Fontain, "my daughter! Bertha, come here." In response to the summons there appeared a slender young woman of about twenty-five, whose face was of a Madonna-like beauty. That care and sorrow had been the portion of Bertha Fontain no one could doubt who gazed upon her, but they had left as their traces only a look of sweetness and resignation which added to the charm of her countenance. Frank Carey, for the first time in his self-appreciative life, felt bashful and confused in the presence of a woman, and when, after a short conversation, in which he somehow learned that Bertha was a stenographer in a downtown office, he left the flat and took his homeward way. He was in such a state of absentmindedness that he found himself in the uptown station of the elevated when he wanted to take a downtown train.

When, next morning, Frank made his report to his employer he said nothing about Bertha except that she was her father's sole support.

"A pale, wornout creature, I suppose," said Goodwin.

"No-o-o," stammered Frank, "she is—er—good looking." He changed the subject abruptly.

"Well," said the lawyer, "I suppose I really ought to go and see Fontain. I will attend to it tomorrow."

He made the call and results followed rapidly. Fontain moved into another and more expensive flat and little evidences of luxury and ready money began to appear about him. Goodwin, who had been a widower for six years and had two married daughters and numerous grandchildren, began to spruce up and indulge in outrageously youthful cravats. He was a constant caller at the Fontain flat. It was as plain as the nose on the face of a Roman senator—the lawyer had picked out Bertha for Mrs. Goodwin No. 2 and father was prepared to hand her over for a pecuniary remuneration.

Frank was frequently an ambassador for his employer to the Fontain establishment, and in one way or another he and Bertha managed to see a good deal of each other. He saw, and Bertha saw, what was up; but it never seemed to enter the heads of their elders that what they thought concerning it was of any moment whatever. Frank and Bertha, however, regarded their own opinions as of the greatest importance.

The law clerk saw that he must sue out two processes in the court of love—a permanent injunction to restrain his employer and a writ of habeas corpus for the possession of Bertha.

But there were the two married daughters whom some one had informed of their father's folly—not Frank; he was above anonymous letters—and who were on the one from Portland, Me., and from Chicago, with all their to protest. But in the efficacy of protestations of married daughters Frank had little confidence. There remained the Mrs. Gallen, widow of Gallen, the butter king, fair, fat and forty-five and with a million in her own right. About two years before Elihu, in one of his marrying spells, had fixed his affection upon the widow—and her money! He had been quite broken up and cross as a bear for two months when she suddenly went off to Europe. Frank picked up the morning paper and saw the widow's name in the list of arrivals by steamship. Here was hope! Goodwin was her attorney—had been her husband's. She was sure to visit his office.

Perhaps, thought Frank, Elihu would have on the one hand a girl, young and beautiful to be sure, but penniless and encumbered with a grasping, disreputable old father whose demands for money had already been outrageous; and on the other an attractive woman of suitable age—and a million of money! And Elihu worshiped money. The next day the widow called and was shown into the lawyer's private office. She was there a long, long time; Frank in the outer office was on pins and needles with anxiety, but with the lapse of every half hour his hopes increased.

While he hoped the married daughters arrived, each accompanied by an assorted lot of children and insistently demanding to see their erring parent. Elihu heard their voices, opened the door and said: "Come in, Elvira; come in, Cynthia—and the dear children. My dears, allow me to present to you Mrs. Gallen, who has consented to become a loving stepmother to you. I am getting old and need a companion in my age."

"Why, pa, we thought—" cried Elvira.

"We heard—" said Cynthia. But they left the rest unsaid.

In the end he did the sane and sensible thing and everybody was satisfied. Reginald Fontain, it is true, threatened to make trouble, but knowing he would not live long to draw it Goodwin calmed him with a liberal pension. For the year which he survived the receipt of his pension Bertha devoted herself entirely to her father, but as soon after his death as propriety permitted she married Frank.

"Canned Music" Simply Means the Preservation of Divine Sounds Through the Centuries.

"Canned Music" was the subject of a talk given by a young man before a group of young people in a New England town recently. One might have thought at the outset that he was about to deal "Canned Music" (as sometimes people contemptuously call music rendered by a player-piano or phonograph) a severe blow, but he fooled his audience. What he had to say, on the contrary, is worthy of every music lover's attention, for it upholds "Canned Music" in the highest degree.

"Yes, call it canned music if you will," he is reported to have said, "but it is canned only as some one might say that the telephone, telegraph and wireless can human thought and expression, or as you would say that important documents are canned when you put them in the cornerstone of a great public building. You can ridicule anything by giving it a sneering nickname, but it is often possible for the shrewd man to adopt the term and make capital out of it. If your friends talk about canning music tell them how the wisdom of the ages is canned in the printed word, how beauty is canned in sculpture or fine architecture."

Card Index Friends' Tastes.

In a middle-western town lives a woman who, though she does all her own housework and lives very simply, is considered the most perfect hostess in her community. Her secret is that she keeps a little box of cards in her kitchen with notes on the tastes and dishes of all her friends. When she expects an old friend for dinner she pulls out the card with his name on it and reads the notes that she had made on some previous visit. "Especially fond of lemon-meringue pie. Does not eat tripe. Takes two lumps in coffee." She then gives him his favorite food for dinner, avoids food that he does not like and, when serving the coffee, knows without asking how he takes it.—Delineator.

Ownership of the Great Lakes.

Lake Michigan is the only one of the five Great Lakes that lies wholly within the United States, and no one of the lakes lies wholly within the territory of the Dominion of Canada. They form the frontiers of the United States and Canada. When states are separated by lakes or land-locked seas the boundaries follow the middle of such bodies of water. Lakes Huron, Erie and Ontario, which belong to Canada and the United States, carry the boundary line in the middle of the lakes, though the use of those waters is common to bordering states.

An Expert.

"What's his defense?"

"An alibi."

"Can he make it stick?"

"I think so. He's a golf player, and is an expert at alibis."
