The Bridal Party.

I had finished my morning studies. The day was beautiful, and I was standing in the vestibule of the parsonage in the town of Cumberland, half inclining to decide upon some recreation for the hours hour before me. Just then, I saw a most interesting couple direct toward me. He seemed to be making from some one in pursuit. As he came opposite the door of the parsonage, he halted, and after looking in a frightened manner up and down the street, staring wildly at me—said:

"Are you a minister?"

I had scarcely time to answer "yes," before in leap'd he, and stood in the vestibule. Thinking that perhaps he was a runaway, who had got into some difficulty in the way that was then raging, I invited him into the parlor, and asked him to be seated. He was excited and restless, as if in great fear or trouble.

After a few moments silence, as if to recover his breath, he asked me to close the door. But he was still not satisfied. Looking anxiously at the door of an adjoining room, he said:

"Is there any body in there?"

"No," said I, "we are alone; say what you wish, I shall hear you."

"Well," said he, "I am ashamed of myself."

Thinking that I had possibly before me a criminal, and would have to act the part of father confessor, I began to be serious, and tried to make my strange visitor feel more at ease.

After a slight pause and wiping away the perspiration that was rolling profusely down his face, he commenced again:

"I am ashamed of myself—I—I, am thirty years old—and, I never seed anybody married!"

I saw the situation at once. My visitor, from the mountains, had fallen in love with some rustic beauty, as unsophisticated as himself, and he had come to me to help them out of their troubles. I assured him that his ignorance of matrimonial affairs was very pardonable, and need give him no anxiety.

"But," said he, "I want to get married and don't know how."

"Oh," said I, "if that is all, I can soon teach you. First, you get some woman to agree to be married to you."

"I've got one," said he, "Sally Jones is willing; we live way down across the river, and she said I should come up and see a minister about it."

"Next," said I, "you must go to the Clerk of the Court, and tell him that you and Sally Jones wish to get married and want a license."

"Can't do it," said he; "the clerk might tell somebody about us, and then all the people would find it out."

I was getting out of patience. "Nonsense," said I; "go and get your license, and bring Sally here some day, and I will marry you."

After a number of questions about the manner of getting married, and the usual cost of the business, my visitor appointed a day for the eventful ceremony, and having strictly charged me to keep the affair a profound secret, departed.

The day came—but the bridal pair did not. Alas for all human expectations; the river was so swollen, that the anxious candidates for matrimony could not cross. There they stood like Moses on the other side of Jordan, viewing the promised land. The bashful lover, like Leander, would no doubt have braved the Hellespont, to reach his bride; but two lives could not be risked to reach a minister, and most sadly disappointed they were compelled to return home unmarried.

A few days after, in one of my customary walks, I met my matrimonial friend coming to the city. Several persons were passing at the time. As he approached me, I accosted him with a friendly "Good Morning," but he hurried on without appearing to notice me. Surmising that he feared being seen speaking to me, lest he might be suspected of the crime of wanting to get married, I passed on. On my return, I found him waiting for me in a place not exposed to public view. Apologizing for not coming on the day appointed, another day was set, and after satisfying himself first to see that I had seen him, he soon hastened homeward.

The joyful day came, but again the fates were unpropitious. It rained—rained in torrents—it poured—but the bridal party came. They were wet and muddy from head to foot, and looked more like escaped prisoners from the chains of Hymen, than candidates for the bonds of matrimony.

In a few minutes the dripping pair were made "one flesh" and after paying what I considered a liberal fee, departed for their home, well satisfied with having learned, experimentally, how to get married.

The Broken Pledge.

A gentleman in Virginia had a boy six or seven years old who wanted to sign the temperance pledge. All the family had done so, but the father thought him too young and would not let him. At last, however, after much entreaty, permission was given. Soon after, the father went on a journey. At one stopping-place away from the town he called for some water. It did not come, so he called again. Still he could not get it; but cider was brought, and being very thirsty, he so far forgot himself as to drink it. When he returned home he related the circumstance. After he had finished, his little boy came up to his knees with his eyes full of tears, and said:

"Father, how far were you from the James river when you drank the cider?"

"Rather more than fifteen miles, my boy."

"Well," said the little fellow, sobbing, "I've walked there and back again rather than have broken my pledge."—Ex.
