MELROSE

On Sunday last Mr. Edward Weaver, of our town, attempted to count the passing automobiles from daylight until dark and he counted 810, and then became sleepy neglecting to count the balance during the evening.

Mr. Charles H. Tracy, one of our successful farmers, firmly believes in spraying fruit trees. Recently we had the privilege of going through his orchard and saw as near perfect fruit as can be found anywhere in the neighborhood. The "Summer Rambo" is very large in size and delicious in flavor. Measuring and weighing an apple of the "Watermelon" variety, we found it weighed 18 ounces and measured 14 inches in circumference.

It will be a surprise to many of our people, especially to those who visited the site that the old Foust Distillery buildings have been purchased by a Baltimore moving picture corporation, who expect to convert it into a moving picture studio. The old distillery buildings will make an ideal location it is claimed, it being on a good state road to York and Baltimore.

At last we are to have the electric light line through our town. Poles are being planted all along the way from near Hanover to a point near Sherman's Church. Trees are trimmed, some wires are being strung and soon the dark places along the thoroughfare from Glen Rock to Manchester by way of Hanover and Pleasant Hill will be lighted.

It has been rumored several times that an auto bus will be put on the Hanover-Baltimore Highway, running regularly once or twice each day to accommodate the business as well as the pleasure loving people.

On Thursday the new macadam and cement road connecting the Lincoln Highway with Baltimore and Washington was thrown open for general traffic as it happened to be the main day for the Hanover fair, many people acknowledged that there was more traveling than ever before in one day in Manchester district.

Mr. Charles Tracy who, nearly two weeks ago had his right arm mangled while cranking an auto truck was released from the hospital in Baltimore on Friday of last week, and came back to his home, one mile west of town. He is doing as well as can be expected. It will be quite awhile until he can use the arm.

Recently an Indianapolis, Indiana, weekly newspaper came to our desk, telling about a large society by the name of "A. B. C. Club," having many members and increasing its membership rapidly. Buttons are worn by the members. It means "Always Be Careful," and should have members in every part of the world.

The funeral of Mr. George Rush took place at Sandy Mount last Sunday afternoon. Rev. Mr. McCaslin preached the sermon. Mr. Rush died suddenly, was taken ill on Thursday morning in Westminster, and died at his home the same evening. He leaves a widow and one sister. He was a good citizen, and an upright man of splendid character.

Mr. and Mrs. Eyler and Edgar Eyler, wife and child spent Sunday with Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur Blacksten.

Miss Lottie M. Caple spent a few days with Miss Frances Fleming, of Mt. Airy, last week.

John Flater fell last week while working on a building in Baltimore and hurt his hip, but is out again.

Weather is warm like summer.

Farmers are hauling the last of their sweet corn.

AVOIDING THE HIGH COSTS

Many women complain of the prices which they have to pay for their winter outfits of clothing in these times. But there is one way in which they can considerably reduce these expenses, and that is by a careful attention to the newspaper advertising.

There are always special chances to buy goods at favorable prices. Some merchants will purchase specially large lots, on the theory of working them off by a big drive, and they will offer exceptionally favorable prices as a result of doing the thing on a big scale. That calls for advertising so the public can know of the opportunity.

Our merchants are constantly finding lots that represent special values, and the public should look for announcements of the same.

The people who fail to look carefully through each issue of The American Sentinel to see what special bargains are offered, overlook opportunities constantly.

Claimed we should cultivate the True, the Good, and the Beautiful. The young crowd get after them by true shooting to bases, good football tackling, and admiration for the prettiest girl.

Vacant seats in church cause alarm, but equal complaint should be made of the vacant seats in the jails of Maryland and the large number of people well qualified to occupy them.

Proof of the Pudding

By JUSTIN WENTWOOD

(©, 1923, Western Newspaper Union.)

"BUT surely you won't disinherit your son just because he wants to marry the girl of his choice?"

Colonel Weir turned his blue eyes upon Miss Madeleine Raines. "I shall do just that," he answered.

At fifty-five the colonel was still an attractive man. He was a martinet; he believed in home discipline. And his son Phil had become engaged without his leave to an actress.

Colonel Weir had old-fashioned ideas about actresses, and he was inordinately proud of the Weir name.

He was pouring out his grief to Miss Raines. She was an extraordinarily attractive girl whom he had met at the beach hotel, where he had gone for a week to recuperate from the shock of the breach with Phil.

And he had found such consolation as had not been his since his wife died, many years before.

He did not want to marry Madeleine Raines. He was too old for that. But he would have liked to have had her about him, in some capacity, for the rest of his days.

"If only the boy had had the sense to choose someone like you, Madeleine!" he sighed. He called her that now, and she called him Harry. It was one of those delightful, quick flirtations that spring up between the young and the middle-aged.

"But, Harry, you haven't even seen this girl. I understand some actresses are quite charming," protested Madeleine.

"My dear, there has never yet been a member of the stage in the Weir family, and there never shall be with my connivance. Either my son gives up this association or he ceases to be a son of mine."

Madeleine sighed. She felt that the colonel was unjust. And she liked the colonel.

"I've given him till Monday to make up his mind finally," he continued. "He's coming down then, and you shall see him for yourself. But I guess that actress woman won't want him when she learns that he's to be disinherited if she marries him."

"Do you think all women are like that, Harry?" asked Miss Raines softly.

"Most of 'em," answered the colonel.

"And me?" queried Miss Raines.

How it happened the colonel never knew afterward, but he found that he had kissed Miss Raines, and that he had affronted her beyond pardon.

She rose to her feet, icy and pale. "I thought you were a gentleman, Colonel Weir," she said.

She received the colonel's stammered apologies in silence. "Isn't there anything I can do to win forgiveness?" he asked.

"It isn't a matter of forgiveness. You have shown me your opinion of me—oh, quite, quite plainly, Colonel Weir. You think I'm like a—like an actress, and that any man can kiss me."

"I respect you beyond every woman I've ever met. Miss Raines, I—I—will you marry me?" he blurted out, overcome by emotion.

Madeleine shook her head sadly. "You have convinced me, Harry," she said, "but—but there's another man—"

"D—n!" muttered the colonel under his breath.

"But I'll always be a—a daughter to you, if you want me," she said, as they neared the hotel.

Colonel Weir heaved a prodigious sigh. He slept unhappily. He knew his proposal had been a foolish thing, but life without Madeleine seemed the essence of boredom and loneliness.

Then Monday came. The colonel, waiting to receive his son, showed no signs of the emotional storm he had been through. His relationship with Miss Raines had been a formal one since that unlucky episode. He stiffened as he saw Phil coming toward him.

"Well, dad?"

"Well, Phil, what's the answer?"

"The same, dad."

"Then there's nothing more to say," said the colonel, turning away.

A soft voice at his side arrested him. "Colonel, for my sake won't you let Phil marry the girl of his choice?" pleaded Madeleine.

"Not even for you. He—why—why, what's this?" he demanded.

For Madeleine had slipped her arm through Phil's. "I—I said I'd be a daughter to you," she faltered.

"You—you d—d young scoundrel, Phil! You—why—why—let's all go in to lunch."

The Limit.

A school-teacher in a nearby city had a pupil who had a habit of chewing his lead pencil and piling the pulp on his desk. The teacher, seeing him do it, one day said:

"Joe, that's the limit."

When the superintendent visited the school he saw the pile of chewed pulp on Joe's desk and said to him:

"What is that?"

"That's the limit," said the boy.

Has Memorized the Bible.

When his eyes began to fail, Rev. W. B. Hogg, the pastor of a western Methodist Episcopal church, started to cultivate his memory by committing to memory the various parts of the Bible, and he has already the New Testament and a large part of the Old. He has submitted to many tests, but he has never failed to demonstrate his perfect familiarity with the New Testament.
