PROGRESSIVE LEGISLATION

The claim is frequently made that the Republican party is opposed to progressive legislation.

If you asked the women voters, what is the most progressive measure that the American people have enacted for the past few years, they would reply, the woman suffrage amendment. What was the record of the two political parties on that amendment?

While both parties co-operated to put that amendment through congress, it is noteworthy that it had the greatest difficulty in securing ratification in the sure Democratic states. The following states defeated it: Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, Louisiana, North Carolina. Every one of those states is a Democratic state save perhaps Delaware, which can not be considered sure for either party.

The income tax amendment was passed by congress during President Taft's administration, by co-operation of both parties, the senate voting for it 77 to 0, and the house voting for it 318 to 14. All the states but six ratified it. Popular election of senators was voted by co-operation of both parties, the senate voting for it 64 to 24, and the house by 238 to 39.

This amendment also had trouble in getting through the Democratic states. Those that failed to ratify it were, Alabama, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Utah, and Virginia. Of these states, nine are usually Democratic, one Republican, and two doubtful.

Prohibition was put through by both parties, the senate voting for it 47 to 8, and the house, by 282 to 128.

It will be thus seen that in these great fundamental measures, which the majority of the people regard as progressive, the Republican party has helped to put them through, and that on woman suffrage and senatorial elections, the Democratic states of the south were the principal obstacle to ratification.

THE FEAR OF HARD WORK

There is a good deal of complaint nowadays that people are extremely afraid of doing any hard work. Many women find this specially noticeable. Not many housewives nowadays can afford to employ servants, but there are many who hire things done, and they find much disinclination to hard work.

They say that many women will not scrub a floor, or mop a porch, or go up on a step ladder, or get down on their hands and knees. The housewife may feel perfectly able to do these things, and think that by performing such active tasks, she may be preserving her physical vigor. But that does not prove she can induce other people to do them.

Such a condition is the reaction from the period when there was a tendency to overwork the women who performed household service. Many of them worked 70 hours a week or more, they had uncomfortable accomodations, and their hours were irregular so they were cut off from social life. Naturally they rebelled from these domestic tasks, which got a bad name, so that now there is a scarcity of that kind of workers. Thus conditions have gone from one extreme to the other.

It ought not to hurt people to do vigorous labor, if it is under healthy conditions, and the hours of work are not too prolonged. People sometimes complain because they get lamed up while doing a job of work, but they might get equally lame if they played lawn tennis.

People who hire help ought to be conscientious about overworking them. At the same time those who work must realize that men and women are meant to work industriously and actively, and that a penalty has to be paid by those who are fearful of good honest physical effort.

AROUSING PUBLIC OPINION

It seems to take a regular political upheaval, or at least a great amount of propaganda and agitation, to get many measures through Congress which are urgently needed for the public good.

Secretary of the Treasury Mellon recently remarked, for instance, in regard to the proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the issue of any more tax exempt securities, that "tax exemption is repugnant to every principle of the American constitution," and that "if public opinion could be aroused," the proposed amendment could be put through.

But this seems to many people an abstract financial matter in which it is difficult to get interested. It is just one example of how hard it is to wake people up to the changes that need to be made.

One reason for the same is that the time of the congressmen is so largely taken up by importunate constituents who demand appointments to office and other special favors. The government needs less attention to merely personal and neighborhood interests, and more work on the big problems.

PUSHERS

The man who is trying to build up a business, should study the mental processes of the public, and do the things that seem to be necessary to attract public attention. If he just offers his stuff for sale, without much regard to popular psychology or effort to attract attention, he is not likely to get very far.

There is a kind of mental affinity between the quality called "push" and the popular mind, so that a person who exercises push wins popular favor. People like to do business with him. This explains why so many business successes have been built up out of newspaper advertising.

If a producer or distributor makes it his regular practice to advertise in a newspaper, he gains two positive advantages. In the first place, he will sell a lot of the special stuff that he advertises. If he is getting out things that people want, they will eagerly read his notices to see what these things cost and what kind of stuff he is offering.

But this seller does a lot more than merely win the interest of those who at any one time want the particular stuff he is advertising. He also creates a general impression that he is one of that useful element of people who are commonly called "pushers."

Push is a fine quality. It arises from a type of mind that is not daunted by the obstacles that confront one's path. The pushers look over a business field, and realize that competition is sharp, that they must go up against popular habits. But they show their pushing quality by energy and initiative, and if they go at it right, they can make their way and win a prominent place in the business field. Newspaper advertising and good service are tools with which they can do it.

A CHURCH UNITY PROJECT

The National Congregational Council has just passed a resolution which seems to favor the idea of uniting that denomination with the Presbyterian churches. As there are considerably over 2,000,000 Presbyterians in this country, and nearly 1,000,000 Congregationalists, such a move if it could be accomplished, would be a long step toward church unity.

The splitting up of the Protestant churches into a great number of big and little denominations has lessened the power of these organizations, and has increased the cost of operating these churches and their benevolences. It is inconceivable that Christ would ever have approved of such a spirit of sectarianism. As different methods and ideas are necessary to suit all types of people, there is an excuse for a certain amount of division. But when churches are as nearly alike as the Presbyterians and Congregationalists, they gain little by trying to maintain a separate existence.

DUMPING UNDESIRABLES

"The European governments are endeavoring in every possible way to hold their really desirable citizens at home, and are striving strenuously to unload on the United States the great mass of the depraved and degenrate with which their cities are crowded."

The foregoing statement was made by Congressman Aswell of Louisiana on returning from a trip to Europe. He went over with Secretary Davis of the department of labor, so he must have studied the immigration question with some care. Perhaps his idea may be exaggerated, but the same statement has often been made by other authorities. There must be some basis for it.

This suggests the great care that should be exercised in admitting aliens into this country. It is not enough to examine them physically and make sure that they have no diseases. Their character and mental attitude and record are even more important than their physical condition. The government should support the immigration service more liberally, so that it could do its work adequately.

If possible applicants ought to be examined on the other side of the water, so that poor people would not be spending their money to cross the seas and then get turned down. Even it is hard to see how such examinations could be thoroughly satisfactory unless applicants were prepared with recommendations showing that they had been willing and useful workers and law abiding people in the communities where they had recently lived.

A man who has no record of good and faithful work on the other side of the ocean is a doubtful proposition as an American citizen. He would better stay where he is, until he has demonstrated his fitness to enter the land of the free.

THE ARMY AIR SERVICE

A committee reports to Secretary Weeks that an alarming condition exists in the army air service, due to shortage of flying personnel and equipment.

Our people hate war, but if they are going to have any army at all, they must have a modern army which shall be good as far as it goes. An efficient small army is necessary in these troublous times, to show the world that the American people have not become effeminate.

The air service will do a big share of the work of the next war, and an army without a good one will not be worth much. The air force need not be large, but money enough must be spent to keep it up to date and efficient.

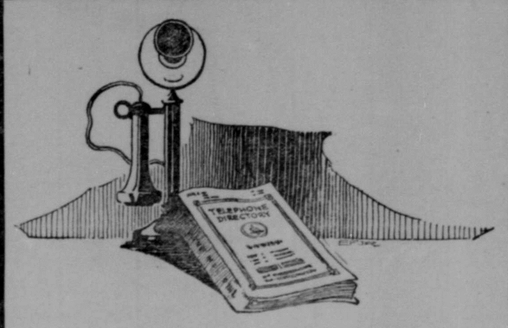

RIDING ON A PASS

In every life, a lot of people ride on the good things handed out to them, but make little or no return. They forget that previous generations, and many good workers of the present time, have created and maintained fine institutions and the facilities of comfortable living, and that a debt is owed to those who have gone before.

The only way to repay that debt, is to work for the further up-building of the community, and to hand on some new benefits to the present generation and those who shall come thereafter. Those who fail to do so, ask the privilege of riding through community life on a free pass.

Citizenship classes being held in many places. The prominent citizens who are too indifferent to vote should attend them.

The sons of the boys that used to save money by going barefoot are now seen swelling around in fancy stockings.

That thunderous sound proceeding from certain homes is not the roar of Niagara, but merely the women folks holding an afternoon party.

The design is to be changed on some of the small bills, but it is not claimed this will make it any easier for the people of Westminster to hang on to them.

Some people fear civil war in this country, and anyway the kids are having some awful fights in the back lots with over ripe vegetables.

The government issues bulletins on the eradication of pests, but it does not inform us how to get rid of book agents that take too much of our time.
