IN THE WEE SMA' HOURS

it is particularly annoying to be called from bed by the insistent ringing of the telephone downstairs.

An extension telephone installed in your bedroom—or where you please—upstairs, will permit you to take the call without the frenzied hunt for slippers and the dash downstairs which usually precedes it.

An extension telephone is useful always, and invaluable in emergencies. And it costs but a few cents a day! Our Business Office will be glad to give you full information or take your order.

Mrs. Margaret Caples entertained Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Caples and family, of Klee's mill.

Mrs. A. H. Bair entertained Thursday Mrs. Chester Shipley and Mrs. Susie Williams, of Bird Hill.

Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Carr entertained Sunday Mr. and Mrs. Harry Carr and family, of Gist, Mr. and Mrs. Granville Carr and family, of Westminster.

Miss Fern Schneider, of near Wakefield, spent from Friday until Sunday with her mother, Mrs. Lottie Schneider.

The school entertainment was quite a success. Each child did his or her part well and showed how nicely their teacher had trained them. Everybody enjoyed themselves. This school is taught by Miss Emma Caples, of whom the children seem very fond.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Polster spent Thursday with Mr. and Mrs. William Rupert and family.

Preaching Sunday evening at 8:00 o'clock, by Rev. H. C. Burkins at Zion M. P. church. Christian Endeavor meeting 7:30. Leader, Mrs. D. G. Hook.

Mrs. Viola Martin was a Monday guest of Mrs. Margaret Caples. Mrs. Susanna Caples spent Sunday with her.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Gist were Thursday guests of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hughes.

We had quite a hail storm Sunday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Emory Baker have Mrs. Baker's mother, Mrs. Bollinger, of Eastview, as their guest.

Mr. Harry Wagner, Harry Leppo and Misses Mary C. and Gladys Leppo, were Sunday guests of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Edmondson.

STONE CHAPEL

There will be no Sunday school or preaching at Stone Chapel May 31st. Recalled for Children's Day service. All those taking part in this service will have their last practice at the church, at 10 A. M. May 31st. Come and enjoy the Children's Service at at 7:30 P. M., May 31st.

Medford Grange will hold a festival in its hall, June 3rd, beginning at 6 P. M. Will have on sale, sandwiches, coffee, ice cream, strawberries, cakes, and home-made candy. The ladies will take great delight in serving everyone.

Several cases of grippe in the community.

The electric storm on May 24th was not as severe as elsewhere. Several phones out of commission. During the storm Mr. Clay Roser had two fine cows killed by lightning. A coincidence. Mr. Roser bought the cows at the same time and place. They stood side by side in the stable, and died side by side.

SWEET AIR

Health of community good.

The Head Start

By FAIRFAX DOWNEY

(©, 1925, Western Newspaper Union.)

TRAINER JAKE JONES, whose eyes resembled hard-boiled eggs, fixed them on Stickney McVey, giving that youth an uncomfortable sensation, as if he had eaten too much at a picnic.

"I've done right by you, Stick," declared Trainer Jake. "I've worked hard and earnest on you. You got the build, you got the strength, you got the stride of a runner. But, Judas Priest! you ain't got a getaway. Every time you get left at the post.

"The meet tomorrow with Clay is about the last chance I give you. Try and jump the gun—just once. If you try that, you may start on time after all."

And with that nasty dig, Trainer Jake took himself away.

That night Stickney McVey awoke from a sound sleep to find his bed surrounded by sinister figures in the robes and cowls of monks. By their insignia, he knew he was the recipient of a visitation from that fraternity, an honor highly coveted at Enfield college.

The boy in bed broke the silence with, "Kind of late, aren't you?"

"Lateness is not inappropriate in a visit to you," the spokesman declared, and in his words there seemed to be malice aforethought.

Then the hooded figures spoke in unison: "Rise, base worm; gird thyself and come forth to trial by combat, boiling in oil, and other ordeals to test if thou be worthy."

"Say, you better let me off tonight," Stickney protested. "I'm in training, you know. Meet with Clay tomorrow. Got to run the hundred."

"The neophyte seems to think," sneered the leader, "that his presence in the meet will make some difference. We had not noticed that it had in the past. We come now to take over your training."

That night Stick McVey ran as he never ran before and hoped never to run again. The event he ran was the gauntlet. Four strong-armed Mu Nus were at the start of every sprint, when Stick crouched for the start. Being equipped with paddles, they insured the continuation of the impulse, and at the finish were more brethren who indulged in slaps of congratulation. Finally the initiate did a fast sprint to his room, locked and barricaded the door and composed his weary, smarting body to slumber.

It was so funny that even the crowds in the Enfield stands had to laugh when their star pole vaulter's pole snapped just as he was clearing what would have been the winning height. The ludicrous fashion with which he crashed through the bamboo cross bar and the surprised expression on his face when he lit suddenly in the pit were comical indeed. But when that event gave a margin of points to the rival Clay team, the debacle lost its power to amuse.

Stick McVey, stepping none too springily toward the starting point of the 100-yard dash, felt many a pair of eyes on him. He winced, for he realized that now his college's hopes of victory rested largely on him. He'd jump that gun, he would. What did he care if the starter called them all back? It would show 'em he wasn't going to be late this time. No more trailing and finishing fourth for him.

And then as he dug his spikes in the starting holes, Stick knew with a horrible certainty that he was not going to be able to jump the gun—not even with the grueling training the Mu Nus had administered the night before to put fighting spirit in him. Long-formed habit was too strong. He knew in his heart that just as he was deciding to beat the starter's gun by a split second, the darn thing would go off and he would lurch forward too late, in the dust of the field.

Before he started he was a beaten man.

"Ready!" ordered the starter. Eight runners rose from their haunches and caught their light, sure balances with hands resting on the cinder track.

"Get set!" The crouching bodies of the eight bent forward, every muscle at its utmost tensity and nerves strung tight for the crack of the pistol.

In the bark of that weapon was lost the gentle crack of an air rifle fired from the track house, directly in rear of the starting point. The concealed marksman was Trainer Jake Jones.

Stickney McVey sprang forward as if he had been shot. As a matter of fact, he had been.

He must have covered five yards or so with his first leap and on the sixth he hit his stride. His well-muscled legs pounded up and down like the pistons of a smoothly racing engine.

It was a pretty race, the 100-yard dash the stands saw that day. If only the fleeting, thrilling picture could have been more lasting! The watches caught them at only two-fifths over ten seconds. Chest out, head back, Stick McVey broke the tape, gasping for breath. No Clay college man had better than seen his heels, and it was his own Enfield teammates who had crossed the line at his elbows, taking second and third places and salting away the meet.

When track men in later years, deferring to the respected opinion of Stickney McVey, asked that famous pointer what had been the secret of his success as a runner he was wont to display a watch charm containing a tiny BB shot, once extracted from his anatomy. That, he would admit, gave him his first real head-start.

POULTRY

SANITATION URGED TO FIGHT DISEASE

Dr. V. A. Moore of the New York state veterinary college at Cornell university says that the best way as yet known to fight the poultry plague which has alarmed so many poultrymen is by thorough and adequate sanitation. No remedy is known for sick fowls, nor is any drug known that can be given to healthy ones to immunize them.

With these facts in mind, Doctor Moore offers the following suggestions to poultry growers to help them in fighting this swiftly working malady: Keep houses clean and well ventilated, and feed no garbage containing raw chicken flesh or viscera. At least one outbreak was started from feeding hens infected viscera. Be sure that any new fowls come from a healthy source, and isolate newly purchased fowls in a separate house for at least ten days before they are placed in the home flock. Watch all poultry carefully. Remove any sick ones promptly and thoroughly clean and disinfect the place. Burn or bury dead fowls.

Clean and disinfect all used poultry crates brought on the premises. Cats and dogs should not pass from one poultry house or farm to another, and owners, attendants, or other persons should not go from farms on which fowl plague exists to other poultry farms or houses. Take precautions to prevent the virus from being brought to the premises on implements, clothing or animals, and if the virus should gain entrance, keep it from getting away and into other flocks. All infected poultry houses should be cleaned, the litter burned or buried and the floors, roosts, feeding and watering dishes and nests disinfected.

In describing the symptoms of the disease, he says the head hangs down, the comb and wattles become bluish in color, and the temperature, which at first is high, drops to subnormal. The nose and intestines discharge, and this matter is heavily charged with the virus causing the disease. As the plague is reported to be more active in summer than in winter, it is important that its spread be checked and the virus destroyed as soon as possible. The main thing, says Doctor Moore, is to destroy diseased birds and keep healthy fowls away from them, either before or after death.

Soft Shelled Eggs Are Caused by Too Much Fat

Hatching eggs should be tested as early as the fifth day, but in the case of beginners particularly the seventh day of incubation is the best for the first test. By that time it is an easy matter to detect the infertile egg.

A cardboard with a round hole about an inch in diameter cut in the center makes a good egg tester. The room should be dark excepting for the light used in testing. The cardboard should be held between the operator and the light and the eggs placed one at a time before the small hole in the cardboard. The germ will then be easily located.

The dead germ is readily distinguished from the live germ, as it will show a grayish, lifeless appearance. The infertile egg will appear as clear as an ordinarily fresh egg. On the other hand, the fertile egg will show a dark spot in the center, with numerous blood vessels radiating from it. The eggs that do not show a live germ should of course be removed.

It is advisable to test again about the fourteenth day, as sometimes the germ dies in the course of development. Such eggs should also be removed at once, as decay is very rapid and frequently they cause changes in the temperature of the incubator.

Guinea Hens Are Wild

Guinea hens usually are too wild to be set anywhere except in the nest where they have become broody, and often such a nest is unsafe. Because of these disadvantages and the fact that guinea hens do not make the most satisfactory mothers for guinea chicks, ordinary hens are most often used to do both the incubating and the brooding, at least until late in the summer, when the guinea hens often are allowed to sit and raise a brood without much attention being given them.

Poultry Facts

Chickens should be put on the market as soon as they are ready.

One might better hold stock in a wildcat scheme than to buy feed for poor layers. Cull.

Soy bean meal added to the poultry mash must not be made a substitute for animal protein.

* * *

Proper feeding and early marketing are two of the most important factors in the raising of chickens for profit.

* * *

Egg shell color does not affect the food value of eggs, but it does make a difference in the appearance. All brown or all white eggs will command the highest prices.

Very few poultry houses are free from mites, and where these pests are present in large numbers one cannot expect good success in getting his hens to lay.
