Sweet Clover Is Leading Legumes

Crop Is Entitled to Position in Front Rank as Soil Improver.

Chemical investigations which are being made on different legume plants by the college of agriculture, University of Illinois, indicate that common biennial sweet clover is entitled to the position which it has held among the front rank legumes for soil improvement, according to E. E. DeTurk, chief of soil technology.

Alfalfa is a crop of great promise as a combination feed and soil improvement crop, but it is not so well adapted to direct use for green manure as is sweet clover. Red clover, which has enjoyed more than a half-century of recognition as an old standby, is gradually giving way to alfalfa and sweet clover, in part, at least, because of the uncertainty of securing satisfactory stands. Dalea, a comparatively new crop, offers but little promise, while Korean lespedeza, which is just making its debut, bids fair to be a satisfactory acid land crop in the south half of the state, where liming is either pending or in localities where liming is impracticable.

Soil Improving Crops.

While certain nonlegume plants have value as soil improvers, through the addition of organic matter and the conversion of insoluble mineral elements into more readily available forms, the most important soil improving crops will always be restricted to the legume family, because of the added advantage of these plants in fixation of atmospheric nitrogen.

Growing crops and bacteria, like human beings, are prone to save energy. Energy is required in the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. Consequently both legume crops, even though well inoculated, and their nodule bacteria as well, will absorb and utilize nitrate nitrogen from the soil when it is present, in preference to working harder for the air supply. Thus soils that are already well supplied with available nitrogen do not benefit as much from the growing of legumes as do poorer soils which are more greatly in need of building up.

Most Desirable Legumes.

The most desirable soil-building legumes are all acid-sensitive crops, so that on acid land their use is conditioned upon the use of limestone. Some areas of acid land in Illinois are so inaccessible to liming facilities as to make the problem of soil improvement by means of limestone and legumes a serious one. It is probable that acid land so situated could be managed to the best advantage by either devoting it to forestry or other special uses or else building it up by the use of limestone and the proper use of legumes. It is questionable whether such land can ever be maintained permanently profitable under general farming in which the cropping system is restricted to acid land crops. There is not enough evidence upon which one can make dogmatic statements in this regard. However, it is unquestionable that the production which can be maintained permanently under such conditions is at a marked ly lower level than where the acid condition of the soil is corrected.

How to Fail in Dairying Told by Iowa Specialist

A sure way to avoid having a lot of milking to do is to follow the suggestions offered below, according to Burt Okerkirk, dairy production extension specialist, Iowa State college.

Keep the milking cows in the cornstalks to dry them up before winter—it is difficulty to milk by lantern light.

Feed timothy hay, straw or cornstalks because these are low in protein, a muscle builder—the cows can be handled easier.

Don't use balanced rations.

Don't use a silo—silage stimulates production.

Have a pitchfork ready at all times to teach cows their places. Always pet them with a milk stool.

Keep 30 cows that produce 150 pounds of fat each rather than 15 that average 300 pounds of fat.

Keep a scrub bull or cow freshener.

FARM FACTS

Have the weed trees all been taken from your woodlot?

* * *

Jabbing the reins or continued tapping with the whip soon will teach the young colt to be an old loafer.

* * *

Keep calves and young stock growing in a thrifty condition. Their future usefulness depends largely upon present care.

* * *

If properly planned a crop rotation will aid materially in distributing the farm labor and will greatly reduce the amount of outside help required for the efficient operation of the farm.

* * *

The more pigs saved per litter the more profit there is in hog production, so give the brood sow plenty of exercise, enough, but not an overabundance of food, and see that her pen is clean and dry.

* * *

While trees and shrubs are dormant caterpillar nests and egg masses of various insects may be seen readily. Burn the nests with a torch of kerosene soaked rags, and paint the egg masses with a solution of creasote.
