BEAUTY in WINDOWS

TOO many people think that windows—when they give any thought to them at all—are nothing but holes in the wall filled with glass. That is why so many houses today lack interest or charm.

The builder with taste thinks differently. He knows that with the proper spacing of the right size and kind of windows, he can make even the plainest, most inexpensive house actually beautiful.

The picture above shows a Curtis window. Note the interesting little panes and the thin muntins that divide them. The stiles and rails are delicately molded to give beauty in detail as well as general appearance.

But beauty in Curtis windows is not all you get. The check-rail of this window is so constructed that it puts up seven times as much resistance to the entrance of wind as ordinary check rails. That is but one example of Curtis quality.

Come in and talk over your window requirements with us. See our stock of other Curtis designs, too. Get a copy of an interesting, illustrated book, "Curtis Woodwork." It is free.

A Land-Lubber's Luck

"NO, TED, there is no use talking about it," said Carol, definitely.

"But I want to talk about it, dear," insisted Ted Morton.

"It would be perfectly ridiculous for us to marry. I like to swim and sail, cruise, fish and live on a houseboat. You crave golf, horses, following trails through virgin forest, camping. Now, wouldn't we be a fine married pair? Couldn't we have a happy, congenial family life?"

"We're happy now," argued Ted.

"Yes—while you are so crazy about me that you will live in a bathing suit or hold a jib-sheet just to be near me. But, once we were married—well, you'd play golf while I went sailing alone—maybe!"

They continued to argue the old question and went around the same circle again and again. Finally, she returned the engagement ring he had given her and he put it reluctantly into his pocket.

Both were too young to let a mere broken engagement mar their happiness and, consequently, Carol never spent a gayer summer than the one following their final quarrel. Ted, too, found great sport in golf tournaments during week-ends and in the camping expedition with three men up into the Canadian Rockies.

Carol couldn't stifle her love for the sea. She had been brought up on the shore. Her first playthings had been sea-shells. Her early friends were old fishermen who used to pick her up and tuck her into the stern of their boats while they caught their daily string of shining sea food. She had learned to swim and row and feel perfectly at home in a boat. So that now, when once more she was able to spend a half of the year near her beloved water, it was little wonder that she took to it as did the proverbial duck.

She and Ted Morton had met in town when both were impatient to be out of it. Having, for the moment, a common bond of sympathy they had found much in each other. They missed something they had both found when he went to the country club where he lived in summer and tripped back and forth to the city to business and she sought the seashore. At first, both sacrificed the hours of sport they cared about to be together. Sometimes Carol would walk over the links to watch the players. Again, Ted would sit on the sand or swim or even go a-sailing in order to be with the girl who had promised to marry him.

But neither was happy. Neither was honest.

"This just bores me to extinction," Carol would be saying to herself as she walked miles on the fairways in the wake of Ted and his fellow players.

"What anyone can see in sitting in a boat that tips and splashes and lists like this, I'll never tell you," Ted would grumble, inwardly, as he felt the uncomfortable movement of a sail-boat in which Carol was gracefully and perfectly at home.

After four years, Carol began to wonder why it was that she failed to find again the companionship that she had met in the personality of Ted Morton. When she had tossed away his love she had been optimistic enough to believe that on the next wave—and on the next—would come men into her life that would do just as well. This had proved not to be the case.

"Mother," she began, one evening as they sat together in the dusk, "what did you do for fun when you were a young girl?"

Her mother laughed. "You would be surprised if you knew. I liked nothing so much as roughing it in a mountain shack or going with a crowd of girls into camp, gypsies we were. We lived on the border of a great pine woods in a mountain town and I was veritably a part of the soil."

"And—you came to live by the sea?" asked Carol.

The mother nodded. "Yes—your father felt that he could not live elsewhere. He had come of seafaring folk in New England and at first I hesitated to leave my beloved hills. I found, however, that to be with him was the most important thing in the world and then—when you came—I was quite satisfied with life, dear. You are as bad as your father about the water, aren't you?"

Carol did not say much after that. She was thinking—thinking about the loneliness underneath the superficial gayety of the past four years.

It took a great deal of courage to do what she did in the next few days.

She wrote Ted a long letter which she began with her old pet name, "Dear Landlubber." In it, she told him much of her experience with life since they had been separated. She told him of how she had tried to be content without him. It was a letter she could not and would not have written four years ago.
