TWO BECOME SICK FROM TREATING WHEAT

Herbert Eyler and son living on the A. W. Feeser farm, Taneytown, have both been critically ill, as a result of inhaling carbonate of copper dust, while treating seed wheat. Mr. Eyler used the poison in a closed granary while mixing it with the wheat, instead of out in the open, and did not use a mask or any protection to mouth or nostrils. Both father and son inhaled the dust sufficiently to imperil their lives. It completely impregnated their system, coloring their skin and eyes to a coppery hue, and causing great pain, for about a week. The copper carbonate dust is very poisonous and should be used very carefully, according to instructions, that can be had from those who handle the dust, or the containers for its use. A mask should always be used over the face, and the treating be done in a well ventilated place, or out in the open.

FARMERS TAKE NOTICE

Copper carbonate dust is poisonous and it is very necessary that farmers using it for treating seed wheat for stinking smut apply it in the open, and not attempt to use the dust in a shed or on the barn floor. In either case, it is almost sure to cause sickness. When the dust treatment is used in the open, however, there is absolutely no harmful effects ever felt. County Agent L. C. Burns, in cooperating with the Extension Service, has been conducting demonstrations for the last week throughout the county and it is hoped that the principles of treatment are now well understood.
