FARM STOCK

DIP HORSES IN FALL FOR LICE

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

If horses are lousy in the spring at shedding time it is more than likely they will go into the winter infested unless treated to eradicate the pests. When the animals shed their hair in the spring the lice seem to disappear, and the farmer is led to believe that his horses are free. Some of the lice usually remain on the animals throughout the summer, but not in sufficient numbers to cause annoyance or to be easily detected. The animals, therefore, usually go into the winter infested, and during cold weather lice increase very rapidly.

Since the best remedies are liquid dips, which cannot safely be used on horses during cold weather, fall dipping should be practiced whenever horses have been lousy at shedding time in the spring, says the United States Department of Agriculture. Three kinds of parasites are commonly found on the skin of the horse in the United States—lice, mange mites, and ticks. All three may be present on an animal at the same time. The lice can be eradicated by spraying or dipping the infested animals twice with an interval of from 14 to 16 days between treatments.

Mange is one of the most injurious skin diseases that affect horses. Four or more dippings at intervals of from 5 to 7 days usually eradicate the most common form of the disease. Lime sulphur and nicotine dips are suitable for controlling mange.

Many different kinds of ticks affect horses. The spinose ear tick is prevalent on horses in the Southwest and causes serious damage. The ticks enter the ears of animals, where they may be destroyed by a mixture of 2 parts pine tar and 1 part cottonseed oil injected into the ear canal.

Complete instructions as to the various dips and remedies suitable for eradicating these three parasites of horses may be had by writing to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington.

Causes of Most Early Deaths in Live Stock

The causes of most early deaths in live stock fall into two general classes:

1. Those capable of considerable reduction, chiefly through eradication of diseases among the mature stock, proper hygiene, sanitary isolation, and medical treatment. In this class are tuberculosis, acute respiratory diseases, certain acute contagious diseases, and some diseases caused by animal parasites.

2. Those capable of very great reduction through proper feeding, care, and sanitation, such as acute digestive diseases, goiter troubles, prematurity (if not extreme), and many forms of animal parasitism.

Besides the two important classes mentioned there are some other conditions, such as malformation, extreme feebleness or extreme prematurity, and certain accidents during birth. These conditions are little influenced by treatment, but represent a very small proportion of total loss.

Removing Silage

In removing silage from the silo, only enough is thrown down for immediate needs and this is taken in thin layers over the entire surface, the aim being to allow as little as possible to become spoiled by exposure to the air. The surface must be left smooth and compact, with the center slightly higher than the sides. If the corn was not well distributed in the silo, some care needs to be exercised in mixing the silage on removal to keep the quality uniform and avoid danger of overfeeding.

Live Stock Facts

Roosters are confined or sold as soon as the breeding season is past. Hens that are not mated lay as good, and the quality of the eggs is improved.

• • •

Because a hen is pure bred it does not mean that she possesses the vigor and quality which are needed in the poultry yard during the hatching season.

• • •

A clean droppings board is necessary if the eggs are to be kept clean. Some poultry owners now use a screen that keeps the fowls off the droppings board during the day.

• • •

Alfalfa hay is the biggest aid there is in reducing the cost of making beef.

• • •

Genuine crude petroleum, just as it comes from the oil well and before it has been processed, is the most effective oil for treatment of hog lice and mange.

While chickens will stand neglect and sometimes do fairly well under primitive conditions in warm weather, it is very important to provide proper housing if you are going to make the chicken business pay in winter.

MANY OPPORTUNITIES TO ENTER EXHIBITS IN COUNTY-WIDE CORN SHOW

County Agent L. C. Burns announces classes for entering exhibits in county-wide show to-day. From all indications, this year's corn crop will be superior to any in the past several years and arrangements are now being made for one of the largest corn shows ever held in the county. There will be open class for exhibiting.

1. Reids and Reid Type.
   a. Including Reids, Leaming and Pinks.
2. Golden Queen.
3. Lancaster Sure Crop.
4. Other yellow Dents; including Griffords.
5. White Cap, Yellow Dent.
6. Pop corn; including White Rice and Pearl.
7. Other Pop corns.

In addition to ribbons for all the above classes there will be some worth while premiums. Arrangements have been made to have some very competent judges from the State Agricultural College and it will be an excellent opportunity to learn a great deal about how to grow better and more corn in this county. There will be at this show some educational exhibits and it is hoped that all corn producers will come and enter exhibits in one or all the above classes.

One of the outstanding features this year will be the Junior Exhibits by the boys and girls. Any boy or girl under eighteen years of age will have an opportunity to exhibit corn in a Junior Class. The agricultural instructors in the county are planning to have the boys enrolled in their classes enter corn in the Junior exhibits. This will give the young corn growers a chance to compete in the show just as their "Dads" will do. Come on, boys, and see who can select the best exhibits! It will be worth while.
