FLESHING MASH AIDS CONDITION

The high egg production obtained during the past year on the demonstration farms throughout New Jersey, and at the Bergen and Vineland egg-laying contests, is attributed by F. C. Clickner, of the agricultural experiment station, primarily to the use of a fleshing mash during the fall and winter season. The effect of the mash has been to keep the birds up to proper body weight, so that they were able to resist winter complaints and keep on a steady egg production basis.

The fleshing mash used was made up of the following ingredients: 1 pound corn meal, 1 pound ground rolled oats; 1 pound semi-solid buttermilk, and 1 pint codliver oil, when codliver oil had not already been incorporated in any other part of the ration.

"This mixture," says Mr. Clickner, "moistened with water so as to form a crumbly mash, is sufficient for 100 birds at one feeding. It is best fed sometime near the noon hour, preferably early in the afternoon, so that the birds will have sufficient time to empty their crops and take on a good supply of the scratch feed before perching. The real value in the fleshing mash is that sometimes we find difficulty in keeping the birds up to fourteen pounds of scratch, and they are less likely to drop on this account when the fleshing mash is fed. There is no danger of forcing with the use of the fleshing mash since it is not a wet mash for stimulating production."

New Loves for Old

MISS SELINA BRIGGS lived on Cape Cod. To be precise in Sandport. The house she lived in was the real thing in early Colonial architecture—it had a "lean-to." The family was small, consisting only of herself and her orphaned niece, Henrietta. Miss Selina had squandered her savings in giving Etta an education, even sending her through Wellesley.

And now Henrietta was twenty-two, proficient in all accomplishments but conversant with no calling that would bring in money. She laid a thousand plans for becoming a wage-earner, but her aunt "put her foot down" on every one of them. Etta fretted—but what could she do? She would not forsake Selina, even if she could get employment somewhere else—which was extremely doubtful.

"I wonder if I shall ever be married," thought Etta.

That summer there returned to his boyhood home a Mr. Frank P. Ellsworth, a millionaire from New York. Frank P. had not been seen in Sandport for forty years until he had suddenly appeared there, bought the old Bijah Crandal place, and began the erection of a great stone mansion. He had been twenty-five when he had gone away and, by consequence, was sixty-five now. There were plenty of people who remembered him as the tall, thin, scraggy young man, full of ambition and a hard worker, whose parents were among the town's poor and shiftless. But not one of them would have recognized in the large, portly, prosperous-looking, autocratic and reserved plutocrat, the Frank Ellsworth of long ago.

Every man and woman in the place, it seemed, who was old enough to make out a colorful case, greeted Frank P. like a long-lost brother and intimated that they had been his

GREENMOUNT

The covered dish social which was held in the social room of the U. B. church on Friday was a real success. The sum of $21.00 was realized for the Ladies' Aid Society.

The Every Ready Class of the Greenmount Sunday school, with their teacher Mrs. John E. Clas, motored to the county home on Sunday afternoon and gave a service to the infirm and aged of that institution. The program consisted of songs, scripture reading from the 14th Chapter of St. John and prayer and a real heart to heart talk by pastor H. Dixon Boughter.

Mrs. Susan Eckenrode, of Baltimore, was a week-end guest at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Gorsuch.
