Dr. Chang from China, who is at the Westminster Seminary was present and gave a fine address on Missions. He spoke of customs and conditions in China, and some of his own personal experiences. He has a very keen sense of humor. His address was very interesting, instructive and helpful. Any person not much interested in Missions should hear Dr. Chang. They surely would be a firm believer in the cause. The offering was twelve dollars and a half. The society appreciated so many members from Finksburg attending and contributing to the success of the meeting.

CATTLE IMPROVE COTTON YIELD ON SOUTHERN FARM

At a recent meeting of the Southern Livestock Association at Memphis, Tenn., Ransom Aldrich, a Mississippi farmer, discussed the beneficial effect of a herd of cattle on cotton yields of his farm. Graduating from the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Mississippi about 13 years ago, Mr. Aldrich went back to a farm of about 800 acres and took charge of a herd of beef cattle which has now increased to about 110 head of breeding cows, besides the bulls and calves.

Meanwhile the yield of cotton has increased from 70 bales to 130 bales on the same acreage, the gain being caused chiefly by the increased fertility of the soil. The system of farming includes cattle, cotton, corn, and clover, sometimes called the 4-C system. Though the cattle enterprise has been especially beneficial to the farm's cotton yield, it is likewise profitable in itself. Mr. Aldrich raises November calves and sells them the following September to Corn Belt feeders.

The farm is in tick-free territory which makes possible the direct movement of stock at satisfactory prices. The calves have brought an average return of about $36 a head at 10 months of age. This figure is in contrast to an average feed cost for the cows of about $15.50 a year. The cattle are of improved beef type.

In discussing the experience outlined, Dr. C. D. Lowe, extension animal husbandman of the United States Department of Agriculture, points out that, contrary to a common belief, livestock raising in the South is not a competitor of cotton, but on the other hand is the means of increasing cotton yields.

SETTING PLANTS EARLY AIDS TOMATO YIELDS

Efforts of the growers, canners and representatives of the University of Maryland Extension Service to put the canning tomato crop on a higher paying basis to the grower by improving the yield per acre will this season center largely around the production of early, high quality plants.

Getting plants into the field as early as weather conditions will permit is an important factor in the yield, says County Agent Burns. The early set plants are able to make considerable development before foliage diseases check their growth and in addition have a chance to set a large percentage of the fruit before high temperatures of mid-summer seriously interfere. Numerous experiments followed by repeated field trials under practical conditions in the State have shown this to be true.

Two principal methods of producing early plants of good quality will be recommended to growers the coming season. One will be the use of the cloth covered coldframe and the other the planting of seed in the open under conditions that will favor quick and sturdy plant growth.

The securing of early plants will go a long way to secure the grower a better and larger yield of tomatoes. Now is the time to prepare for the simple experiment of a cold frame which will insure your plants from eight to ten days earlier than you could normally have them without such protection. It is the purpose of the County Agent to see as many growers as possible but he cannot see them all, so get in touch with him at the office and receive the bulletin entitled "More Tomatoes from Fewer Acres" put out by your State College. This is an excellent slogan to adopt and I believe the tomato growers will profit by putting this into practice.
