POULTRY

KILL PESTS IN POULTRY HOUSE

How would you like to sleep in a bed with bedbugs? The hen likes no more to sleep with mites, lice, fleas, etc., than you do with bedbugs. These pests are not so prevalent in the winter as in the summer, but if they are not properly eradicated they will make it very uncomfortable for the hen in winter. The general public has the erroneous idea that these pests of the hen go into hibernation in the cracks and crevices of the buildings and never bother the birds in winter. This does take place to a small extent, but what better place does the pest want to pass the winter than the good, nice, warm, feathery body of a hen?

These pests may be destroyed by careful and vigilant methods throughout the year. The buildings must be sprayed or dusted frequently with some good insecticide. Common old whitewash is a very effective spray or wash for the poultry house if carefully applied so as to fill all cracks and crevices, as well as cover the smooth surfaces. Then, too, it is very practical to apply one of several good commercial disinfectants. All such applications should be made at intervals of three or four months if no pests are seen, but in case some are noticed, apply immediately.

Then comes the treatment of each individual bird. This may be done by either dusting or dipping, but preferably dusting, especially in winter. There are several good commercial powders for the eradicataion of these pests. In applying the powder hold the bird head downward with left hand, dust powder down into feathers, rub the feathers the wrong way and rub powder into skin.

Mash Used in New York Egg-Laying Contest

At the New York state egg-laying contest the following ingredients were used to make 1,005 pounds of mash:

300 pounds yellow corn meal	$7.14
250 pounds wheat bran	5.00
100 pounds red dog flour	2.85
100 pounds ground rolled oats	4.15
100 pounds alfalfa meal	2.89
100 pounds dried meat scraps (50 per cent protein)	4.20
50 pounds dried milk	4.75
5 pounds salt	.07

This makes the cost per hundred pounds about $3.08, and in the contest the best laying pens returned a profit of more than $4 above feed cost for each pullet. At the end of the forty-ninth week the best pullet had laid 283 eggs. The scratch grain used with the above mash consisted of cracked corn.

Crop-Bound Hen

Soon after the poultry are on range watch for the laying hen which has become cropbound from eating too much dry grass. The bird will show a lack of appetite and the crop will appear bulgy. Sometimes the material can be loosened by kneading and removed through the mouth. A lot of cropbound cases die because they are not located until the bird has about starved to death through the clogging of the digestive system.

Poultry Facts

Some poultrymen use the incubator for hatching turkeys, but the turkey or chicken hen is better.

* * *

Dirt, wet and darkness breed lice, mites, mange and other parasites. And these things are drains on your profit. Cleanliness and sunlight save losses—make you money.

* * *

In extremely cold weather it is a good plan to hang a burlap in front of the chicken roosts, as it helps guard against drafts, and also raises the temperature several degrees.

* * *

A hen throws off about a teaspoonful of moisture in her breath every three hours. This means a damp house, and probably roup or chickenpox, if the house isn't ventilated.

* * *

The hen's crop is small and the winter nights are long, consequently the heavier feeding should come near the close of the day.

* * *

Each hen should have four square feet of floor space; this can be made more possible by raising all fixtures two feet above the floor.

* * *

The ventilation problem in the poultry house is much easier to solve if the hens are given enough floor space. Three and one-half square feet of floor space should be allowed for each hen.

* * *

Sprouted oats is the handiest substitute for out-door green feed. You can sprout the oats in pails.

* * *

Hundreds of successful poultrymen are now feeding cod liver oil in the winter to their layers and feel that this is a paying practice.

* * *

If the hen must go out of her way to avoid drafts, or walk around wet places in the litter, or if her working hours are cut short by a lack of light, or if she is crowded her egg production will be lowered.

COUNTRY WOMEN INCREASE THEIR INCOMES IN MANY WAYS

Many Virginia farm women are finding that through the help received as members of home demonstration clubs they are able to start profitable home enterprises. Not only the traditional "butter and egg" money comes to them, but additional income from selling flowers, vegetables, canned and preserved foods, pickles, homemade candies, cakes, grape juice, and many other farm or home products. A report received by the United States Department of Agriculture from the Mount Ayre home demonstration club in Albemarle county is typical: "Eleven members took in $1,400 on poultry, including hatching and table eggs; 2 raised turkeys and made $245; 4 sold cream and butter and earned $250; 1 raised $25 worth of dahlias, and 1 sold her pigs for $299.67."

A woman in Varina, Henrico county, who had an electric washing machine earned a good sum washing blankets for other people; another in the same club sold onion sets amounting to $100. A strawberry patch netted its owner in Smith's Grove, Dinwiddie county, $200, while other members of the same home demonstration group earned money, respectively, from a bean patch, from flowers and bulbs, and from buttermilk. Keeping books for the local gas station was one unusual way for a Beulah, Henrico county, farm woman to add to her income. From Clayville, Powhatan county, a woman sends jonquils to Washington, D. C., and in 1927 they brought her $100. Members of the "Willing Workers" club in the same county have built up a very good business in week-end baskets of fruits and vegetables which are largely sent by parcel post to Richmond. This business developed out of a desire to help the local postal route by having more packages and baskets collected direct from the mail boxes.

Financial worry is said to shorten the lives of many persons, but it doesn't seem to affect many of the slow pay debtors any.

The American people are said to be moving at a rapid pace, but the children do not display it on their way to school.

Claimed the American people are producing more than they can consume, but the men say they will consume all the good pie that is produced.
