THE GIFT OF A LIBRARY

Quite frequently one reads in the newspapers, that some library building well stocked with books has been given by some generous citizen to his native town. It is about the finest thing that anyone can do, and the people who leave that remembrance will never be forgotten.

Many thousands of American towns still have no library building. Yet most of them have sent out citizens into the world who have won success, and could make such a gift without hurting themselves. There seems a certain lack of vision there.
