Selling Vegetables at Roadside Stands

Should Be Home-Grown and of Good Quality.

To make a successful business of roadside marketing one must have sufficient interest, the right help, a good location, and the willingness to be exacting and pay close attention to details, stated Prof. Paul Work of Cornell university, speaking at the New York State College of Agriculture, on roadside markets for vegetables. One must decide whether to make a business of roadside marketing or to merely use it to increase the family income

The produce sold should be home-grown or raised in the vicinity, and never obtained from city markets. Speaking with special reference to vegetables, he said, a fairly full line should be carried with certain products as a specialty. The vegetables should be graded with separate prices and separate arrangements for displaying different grades. Neatness and mass arrangement in display of the goods, with flowers as a side line, increase the stand's selling power.

The site of the stand should be chosen so it may be seen readily from a distance and should have ample parking space around it. The stand should be distinctive, attractive and serviceable. Signs ought to be neat and simple. But they are not as important as a catchy farm name, since permanent and not tourist trade is the more desirable.

The salesman is important in building good will and a large trade. He must present a good appearance, must never contradict, be patient, and not too talkative. Most important of all he must never misrepresent a product. To be business-like, a salesman ought always to be at the stand. Wrapping and packing are important in giving the customer satisfaction. Advertising, after the beginning, is not necessary if the products are good.

Causes of Failures to Secure Alfalfa Stand

Failures to secure stands of alfalfa on reseeding may be due to several causes, farmers interested in new seedings are being advised. Young alfalfa needs a firm, moist seed bed that has been as carefully prepared as for sugar beets, according to Alvin Kezer, agronomist of the Colorado experiment station. For that reason the crop often is started more readily on land that has been previously in a cultivated crop that has left the soil in a good physical condition. Some failures to secure stands of alfalfa may be due to the lack of organic matter in the soil which is sometimes evident on heavy soils that "run together."

Alfalfa makes the best growth when planted fairly early in the season and not over one inch deep on heavy soils. The seed must come in contact with moisture before it will germinate, which sometimes makes it necessary to furrow and irrigate the newly seeded ground. A nurse crop is particularly valuable where the soil tends either to crust or blow, Professor Kezer points out. From one-half to two-thirds of a stand of the nurse crop is sufficient. Barley has proved the best nurse crop all over Colorado, particularly the variety known as Colsess. Kanota, a short-stemmed oat, has proved very satisfactory in the Arkansas valley. After the ground has been planted the alfalfa, rather than the nurse crop, should be favored in the matter of irrigation. The small grain will usually take care of itself as long as the young alfalfa is in good condition. The alfalfa should be irrigated as soon after the nurse crop is harvested as possible.

Rotary Hoe Useful for Breaking Crust on Soil

Among the many uses of the rotary hoe, one of the most important is that of breaking up a crust after a hard rain. Such a crust is a troublesome thing at any stage of the corn crop, but is especially serious if it occurs just about the time the corn or beans are coming through the surface, as at such a time it will turn the tender shoot back upon itself, often preventing its getting through.

Often important uses of the rotary hoe are for preparing fall plowed ground, cultivating corn and beans before they are large enough to plow, renovating alfalfa and clover. Those who have tried out this comparatively new tool are quite enthusiastic as to its value, and it promises soon to become one of our most popular farm implements.

Odors From Weeds Are Quite Difficult to Avoid

If odors come from weeds or garlic in the pasture they are difficult to avoid, but they may be controlled by pasturing the cows in the forenoon, stabling them in the afternoon and feeding some dry feed. As soon as they are milked in the evening they may be turned on pasture again for a few hours if desired. When the cows have to depend wholly on weedy pasture, the best plan is to keep them up at night, save the morning milk separate from the evening milk, and keep the cream from each in separate jars. This method will produce two different qualities of butter, both of which may be disposed of on their individual merits.

This early in the campaign it becomes apparent that "How Dry I Am" is apt to be one of the season's most popular songs.

If the Republicans and Democrats want to make a hit with the radio audience they will advocate a law limiting the length of seconding speeches to twenty-five words.

The Democrats at Houston very properly put a plank in their platform for the outlawry of war but they forgot to extend it to the North Carolina and Tennessee delegations.

There is one nice thing about campaign by radio. The county chairman doesn't have to exaggerate the number of people who listened to the speech.
