Muddy Water Is Sign Of Vanishing Topsoil

Muddy water is a danger signal, a warning that topsoil is being washed off fields. Strip cropping, with alternating clean-cultivated and close-growing crops is one of the best ways to reduce this loss, say scientists of the Soil Conservation Service.

During, or right after a hard rain, water is muddy as it enters the upper side of close-growing strips from the clean-cultivated areas. Oh tne lower side of the close-growing strips, runoff water has decreased in volume and is much clearer. The change is caused by the dense vegetation which filters out soil particles and impedes water flow, allowing more moisture to penetrate the soil.

On steep slopes a larger number of comparatively narrow strips check soil losses more successfully than a few wide strips, the soil specialists say.
