OLD FASHIONED HOUSE PLANTS THAT ARE EXPERIENCING A REVIVAL OF INTEREST

THE FUCHSIA
By The Master Gardner

Fuchsias are coming back into favor again. And after becoming familiar with them, many gardeners wonder why they were ever forgotten. This is one of the house plants that used to be popular with our grandmothers when plants were grown in tin cans on kicthen window-sills—and thrived very well, too, in the steam-laden atmosphere originating in the spout of the singing tea-kettle. The fact that the fuchsia practically disappeared from the window garden for long years now makes it more or less of a novelty. Possibly not more than one variety is listed in most catalogs, if that, but I do know of one general catalog that lists four varieties. This of course is aside from the fuchsia specialists, of which at least one is located in California.

A native of Mexico, South America, and New Zealand, the fuchsia in its native environment grows as a chrub or tree. It is often known as Lady's Eardrops, because of the form of the flowers. I the cooler parts of the United States its use has been confined (until the recent introduction of a hardy variety) to a pot plant in winter and as a bedding plant in summer. I milder climates such has California, fuchsias are grown out of doors the year round. When growing out of doors, choose a site on the east or north side of a building, or under a high branched tree, as the tender varieties do not like the afternoon sun.

The height of the plant varies according to variety ,the usual house plant being about 18 inches, but when grown outside during the summer, will grow to a much greater height. When the plant becomes of some size, it should be staked or supported by a frame of some type.

In growing fuchsias indoors as pot plants ,they must have plety of fresh air and a cool temperature, about 60 degrees. They must have plenty of light, but protect from an extremely hot sun. An east exposure is satisfactory. Only a moderate amount of water is required. They require a moderately acid soil testing 6.0 to 6.5.

Many window gardeners find they have better success with fuchsias as house plants by allowing a rest period during winter. The soil is allowed to dry gradually, the pot removed to a dark basement for two or three months, then the plant is repotted in a soil having a high humus content so that it has moisture holding capacity, yet will no tbe soggy but have good drainage. A complete plant food should be added to the pottin gsoil to furnish needed nourishment. The plant is then brought to the light and allowed to start new growth. Feed every three to four weeks after growth starts.

Some gardeners achieve a rest period for the plant by pruning severely when it is brought indoors in fall, giving the plant a shaded situation and a very moderate amount of water. Then when signs of renewed growth are apparent ,the plant is fed regularly. In pruning, don't be afraid to cut back hard. Cut off old stubs and branches. New growth will start quickly.

Plants may be kept from year to year and if the branches are well cut after blooming, abundant bloom will come. It is best, however, to develop young plants each year from cuttings, because young plants bloom best an drequire less care as house plants.

Since fuchsias are heavy feeders, application of a complete, balanced plant food at regular intervals is an important feature of their care. Incidentally, the California fuchsia specialist mentioned above who is noted for the excellence of his stock, says the secret of vigorous fuchsias is to give them an adequate ration of a balanced plant food. He says he waters the plants heavily before feeding them, and gives another soaking immediately afterwards.

Fuchsia Magellanica, the hardy fuchsia, is of recent introduction. It blooms all summer and into the fall util stopped by frost. While it is especially adapted for shady locations, it is said to flower as freely in full sun as in light shade. It will winter outdoors if protected with straw during the winter . It is best to furnish winter protection in latitudes north of Philadelphia.

THE POET'S CORNER

EXPLANATION
By Betty Lee Collison

You wonder why my thoughts are not of you—
Why I do not think of love as others do.
I do not want anyone to guess.
But my dreams are growing less and less.
As certain as the skies are blue,
I have shaken out my dreams of you.

You were held for a moment against my heart;
It throbbed at the bitter thought we must part.
I bruised my heart that night, yet I let you go.
However, others have been bruised you know.
Now that I've known your lips and guessed that you:
Pledged to another, yet are lonely, too.

Improve Your Woodland In Winter

Through Proper Cutting Farmers Can Improve Conditions

With the approaching winter lull, Maryland farmers may find it to their advantage to cut a supply of fire wood and at the same time improve the condition of their woodland ,it is suggested by C. F. Winslow, forestry specialist for the Extension Service. Mr. Winslow urges all landowners to cut only those trees which offer little or no promise of growing into more valuable specimens, rather than follow the custom of clear cutting which is altogether too prevalent.

Thinning is a natural process anyway and will be carried out by nature in the battle of survival of the fittest, it is pointed out by Mr. Winslow ,so the landowner might as well make use of the insect attacked and diseased wood. Under natural conditions a forest may lose half the volume of wood before the trees reach maturity. A fully stocked young stand of 10,000 seedlings per acre may contain no more than 100 mature trees at the end of 100 years as a result of natural thinning.

Theoretically, thinning should start as soon as crowding becomes a serious ,but from a practical standpoint it is advisable to wait until the trees are large enough so their usefulness will compensate for the labor necessary to cut them.

The following rules for cutting are suggested by Mr. Winslow:

1. Cut trees in areas where crowding is most severe.

2. Cut only those trees which are definitely interfering with growth of potentially valuable trees. A tree with a slight defect which is growing in the open should be left until it becomes more valuable or hampers the growth of better trees.

3. Work over the area, first cutting those trees which have been weakened by insects, diseases, or mechanical injury.

4. Later ,rework the area for trees with crooked trunks and limby tops.

5 Sound trees of an economically valuable species should be favored for future growth and trees having little or no economic value should be cut out. The more valuable trees in Maryland are the various pines ,oaks and the tulip poplar. Black gum, wild cherry, and sassafras should be cut out.

GRASONVILLE

Mr. Neavitt King, of Baltimore was home with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver C. King last Friday.

Miss Catherine Skinner spent the week-end in Baltimore with relatives and friends.

Mrs. Carl Lynch underwent an operation in a Baltimore hospital last week and is improving. Her husband, Mr. Carl Lynch and son Elston, and Mr. William Fooks visited her over the week-end.

Mr. and Mrs. Baxter Coursey of Easton and Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Haddaway and son Don, of Tilghman, were Sunday guests of Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Paswater.

Miss Amy Thomas, a nurse at Emergency Hosptial, Easton, was home with her mother, Mrs. Maud Thomas for the week-end.

SHERLOCK HOLMES AT STEVENSVILLE

Despite the objections of her finance (Alan Marshall, left) who knows more about the dread mystery than he will reveal, Ann Brandon (Ida Lupino) appeals to Sherlock Holmes (Basil Rathbone, right) and Dr. Watson (Nigel Bruce) to save her from certain doom. This scene from "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes," 20th Century-Fox film which will be shown at the Stevensville Opera House, Saturday, November 25, opens the story that plunges Holmes into desperate battle against his arch-enemy, the fiendish Moriarity, in the super-crime of the century.

Can't Trust Thermometer For Measuring Comfort

You can't trust the thermometer for maesuring comfort! Research studies made by Iron Fireman engineers show that on extremely cold days, the normal person will turn the heat as high as 78 degrees in order to get the "feel" of the accustomed 72 degrees . Reason is that the person's body radiates heat to the frigid walls and windows, causing him to feel chilled.

The man who sets the thermostat at 70 degrees, and protests if his wife advances the setting to 72 degrees, may not realize that the average inactive person requires a couple degrees higher temperature for comfort.

RETARDS INFILTRATION

Modern construction requires a sheathing material that not only retards the infiltration of wind, dust and moisture, but also insulates against heat and cold and noise. These requirements are met by various sheathing boards on the market. The sheathing provides maximum protection when used on outer walls in combination with color paneling on interior walls.
