THE proprietor most respectfully informs his subscribers, that ever attentive to their pleasure and profit, he has just made an addition to his library of the newest and first-rate London publications, not only calculateded to amuse the polite and fashionable circles, but to entertain the industrious family, who after their daily toil, will be amused with the delineation of characters which their more confined situation precludes them from observing in real life. To hold the mirror of human life up to nature, is the province of the novelist; the end and design being to expose vice and folly, in order to excite aversion or ridicule; and on the contrary, to display the amiable qualities of virtue in so striking a manner as to render them at once objects of admiration and imitation.
