LONDON, August 26.

Several of the Hanoverian officers are said to have entered into the Russian service.

General Ney has presented to the Helvetic diet a new project of a defensive alliance, with changes and modifications, which cannot fail, say the Paris journals, to make it be received more favorably than the former. On the head of subsidies, 8000 men are required instead of 12, as formerly proposed.

The menace of invasion is still kept up, but we think the tone used upon the subject is not quite so cheery as it was. Gen. Angerean, it is said, is to command an encampment of 50,000 men upon the Flemish coast, and gen. Massena another encampment near St. Omer's. Gen. Mortier is also to have a command in the expedition.

Letters from Brunn mention, that all the merchants who trade with Turkey are in a state of consternation. A caravan from Germany, after passing Semlin, has been pillaged near Constantinople, when it was thought to be in perfect safety. Another on its route for Germany, with Turnish and Greek merchandize, has been also pillaged near Orsowa, on the point of entering the Austrian territory. The leaders of the Janissaries at Belgrade are reinforcing the number of their partizans. Instead of from fifty to sixty, each of them has now more than two hundred followers. They collect provisions in proportion. These measures are attributed to a report, that the son of the pacha whom they assassinated, has married a sultana at Constantinople, that Belgrade is assigned her in dowry, and he is consequently preparing to take possession of it. That city is a prey to every alarm.

It is whimsical that the day chosen by Bonaparte for his assuming the consulate for life should be the feast of assumption.

The subsequent letter, said to be written by the chief consul of France, to the widow of the late monarch of Etruria, is translated from the Courier de Londres of August 2d. Ample ground is here afforded to infer the views of Bonaparte with regard to Great-Britain :—

"I am made acquainted with the loss which has happened to your majesty, and most sincerely participate in your grief. But God disposes of the lot of empires as of the life of those who are placed at their head; and it is his will that we must conform to and adore in every misfortune. Ah! I, who am now sympathizing with you, am I not destined soon to close the course of my existence? Will tears be shed for me on that occasion? Men are so ungraetful!—I have known your spouse. If he have not displayed, during his short reign, the qualities of a great king, he has at least shewn those which do honor to a private individual. But you will perhaps suggest, that the timidity of his conduct whilst upon the throne, sprang from the influence I had over his decisions. The minute ceremonies of religion, frequent communications with its ministers, appertain not to the man whose daily task it is to contemplate the interests of his people. It is certainly proper to protect and disseminate religion; because it is the link between the sovereign and the people: but it ought not to impose any other yoke upon the former, than that of some external practices; he should think only of the immensity of the power of the Supreme being, of which his own is but the feeble image.

"I am persuaded, madam, that your education has given you ability to appreciate, in its whole extent, what I have here observed. In general, you are accustomed to revere priests whilst statesmen regard them as public instruments. You blindly give your belief to a doctrine which is only a means to confirm obedience on the part of the people. I complain of you, madam, without any idea of blaming you; but those errors which I point out, ought not to be permitted to creep into the mind of your son. He will one day have to succeed to the reins of government which his father has quitted. This should seriously occupy your mind; and if he cannot draw, with propriety, rules of conduct from his father's administration, it belongs to me, his protector, to supervise his education. The event of my arrival at the supreme magistracy of a great country, ought to serve as a lesson to kings. My example ought to fix their power more firmly in their hands. I have demonstrated to them how mankind may be conducted; how its prejudices may be conquered, in order to render it submissive to the restraints which the state of society demands. Every regulation, all the systems which govern empires are destroyed by the ravages of time and those of philanthropy. I have refixed every thing; I have regenerated every thing. I ought not to withdraw from this career of beneficence and glory. I cannot, moreover, deliver the countries which are under private influence—a country of my own creation; a prince whom I ought to make accountable to me or my successors for the prosperity of his states, for the happiness of his subjects; I cannot, I say, deliver so many superior interests into the hands of inexperience and error.

"I propose to appoint then, madam, a tutor to your son; a regent to his dominions. But I by no means intend to deprive you of the exquisite pleasure of receiving his caresses, nor of an acquaintance with his progress; you shall possess the title of regente, which your connection with him claims. General Clarke is to receive your orders for the internal affairs, which have no relation to the administration of the kingdom; but it is from me alone from whom he shall derive impulse, as it is to me that he shall give an account of his conduct. I will add, madam, that faithful as you are to the principles of a religion which dictates the denial of one's self, and submission to the superior powers specially established by the will of the Most High God, you ought to feel the less repugnance to consent to the propositions I have presumed to make. If, however, you think proper to refuse the deference which I solicit of you; if you cannot resolve to see your son confided to the able and faithful hands which shall guide his studies; I shall feel myself necessitated to take upon me the government of your estates. At the same time if you have any solid objection to general Clarke, I am willing to confer with an envoy, deputed by your majesty, for the selection of a person both consonant to your taste and my own; but I must provide, that this choice do not fall upon any man in Italy."

Cleared, brig Hiram, Cullum, Jamaica; sloop Experiment, Garp, Bermuda; Laurel, Hasse, St. Bartholomews.

The ship Two-Sons, Cook, arrived at Salem on Saturday, in four months and 10 days from Moka.

CHARLESTON, October 3.

The brig Fame, captain Messroon, 29 days from Bordeaux, and 38 from London, arrived this morning. Capt. Messroon was chartered to take a freight from Bordeaux to London; and, on returning, although only in ballast, was not suffered to enter; and was peremptorily ordered to quit the port in one hour, without taking a single article on board. So severe was the prohibition, that he was not allowed even to supply himself with the necessary provisions for his voyage. He was, however, fortunate enough to obtain from captain Baas, of the John and Francis, a few barrels of beef. The only reason assigned for this treatment, was his coming from a British port.

October 3, arrived, schooner Esther, Churchell, Kingston, 34 days, in distress, bound to Boston. On the 29th ult. between Cape-Fear and Cape-Hatteras, captain C. experienced a violent gale of wind from the N. E. which carried away his main-mast; and being short of provisions was compelled to bear away for the first port he could make. Spoke, off Cape-Antonio, on the 18th September, the schooner Eliza, from Baltimore, for New-Orleans. Left, the ship John, Gorton, to sail for this port on the first September; schooner Ann, Maxwell, for Norfolk; sloop Ark, Lusher, for this port, repairing.

BRIDGE-TOWN, September 3.

His majesty's land and sea forces, under lieutenant Greenfield & commodore Hood, have again been put in motion, and sailed from Carlisle bay on Thursday last, on an expedition against the Dutch colonies to the Southward. Lieutenant general Grinfield, commands in chief; lieutenant colonel Nicholson (of the royals) is 2d; lieutenant colonel Shipuby commands the engineers, and captain Sheldrick the artillery. The army is composed of choice troops, and sufficiently strong for the enterprize they are engaged upon; the naval force is equally powerful and well appointed; the most ample and extended conquest must therefore be expected to result from their united efforts, which have already added lustre to the British name in the West-Indies.

If fair, the reverend John Healey will preach a charity sermon, next Lord's day, at the Baptist meeting house on Fell's Point for the benefit of the Orphans residing on Fell's-Point, belonging to the Impartial Free School. Service to begin at half past ten o'clock A. M.

This being the first opportunity offered on Fell's Point for raising a collection for the education of the orphans, under the care of the impartial society, it is presumed that the inhabitants will come forward with their usual benevolence, as on similar occasions, to aid and assist this institution, as there are from 15 to 20 orphans belonging to the Point placed by this society, in some of the best schools on the Point, who are looking up to a generous public for their future support and patronage.

Our correspondent in London, under date of August 30, observes, "There are daily complaints among the merchants of the uncommon stagnation of business, the want of markets or demand for merchandize, and the scarcity of money, or what passes for money. There never was remembered a time when so little business has been done at the custom-house as for the last two months, and yet it is to that source that the minister looks for the chief part of the yearly revenue. The importation trade cannot but be considerably affected by the blockade of the Elbe and Weser, and the number of our cruisers which are running about the North Seas in every direction, causing great alarm even to our allies on the continent, must have the effect of suspending shipments of goods which would otherwise be constantly coming in. The stagnation of business at the custom house, and excise-offices, must materially lessen the receipts at the exchequer. How this deficiency will be provided for, or what effect it will produce, cannot be predicted. I am just informed, that such has been the distress for cash felt by the merchants and bankers, that the bank of England has been applied to, and actually discounted bills to the amount of a million and a half per week, for several weeks past. It is hoped, that these evils, which are of a very serious nature, will be of short duration.

"With respect to invasion, we are still threatened with it; but government is so well supported, that they have more men offering as volunteers than they have arms to supply them with. Drilling goes on with great spirit. The ex-minister, Mr. Pitt, as commander of a corps of Kentish volunteers, and Mr. Addington, are on the same military duty in different parts of the country.

"Accounts from Ireland, relative to the late insurrection and its consequences, are of so contradictory a nature that there is no coming at the truth. The lord lieutenant and mayor of Dublin are doing every thing in their power to guard against the insurgents; but it is evident the country is far from being out of danger. Two counties, Meath and Kildare, are declared out of the king's peace, and put under martial law. Meanwhile, every one who has lately travelled over that country, must feel strong sympathy for the wretched situation of its peasantry." [Phil. Gaz.]
