BOSTON, December 25.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

Since Saturday we have received our files of London papers to the 7th November, P. M.

We have not any correct additional accounts of the operations of the French grand army in Germany since the surrender of Ulm. Ulm surrendered the 17th October, and the French emperor continued in its vicinity on the 22d! There have been reports that the French & Bavarians had crossed the Inn, and had cut up the Austro-Russian army (about 60,000) on the right bank of that river. And also, that marshal Bernadotte and prince Murat, had in their turn been cut up—But no credit need be given to these reports—The French official Augsburg Bulletin is the latest from the vicinity of the reported scenes of action, and it makes no mention of the first. And we know, at the time stated, prince Murat was in Franconia and Bernadotte in Bavaria, not short of an hundred miles apart.

The strange conduct of Gen. Mack has been as severely ridiculed by the French, as it has been execrated by the Austrians and English. In consequence of his capitulation, the archduke Charles—to prevent being surrounded—had been necessiated to quit his strong position on the Adige, and to retreat to the Tagliamento, near the confines of Italy and Austria; where he was taken measures to make a vigorous stand against Massena. By this movement, the French have the entire command of the Venetian states.

Our faith in the complete accession of Prusssia to the coalition against France, is not fully established. The conduct of her monarch is as yet inexplicable. At our last dates, he had collected four very formidable armies, commanded by his ablest generals; and had placed them in positions where they may best annoy the French grand army, under Bonaparte, should it attempt to approach Vienna. The strongest army, that in Franconia, (amounting to 90,000 Prussians, Saxons and Hessians) was not very remote from the left flank of the French. He had discovered the greatest resentment at the violation of his territory by the French emperor, & protested against it in the strongest terms—He had given free liberty to the Russian and Austrian troops to pass through any part of his territory—He had actually mached a body of his troops, and in conjunction with a Russian force had taken possession of Hanover, in the name of the king of Great-Britain, and had re-established the former government—He had apparently inspired the courts of Vienna and London with a confidence in his attachment to them—and his officers had forbidden the entrance of Prussian vessels into French, Dutch and Spanish ports.—All these circumstances ould seam to be sufficient indications of hostility to France, and a determination to make common cause with the allied courts. But then he had not declared war, nor published any manifesto of his intentions; and it was said (Oct. 15, 1805) that the answer of Bonaparte to the Prussian note, transmitted by general Duroc, would eventually determine the conduct his Prussian majesty would pursue: and we do not find in the French papers, not in the communications of Bonaparte to his army, any suggestions of the open hostility of Prussia. Our last London paper (the Courier of Nov. 7, 1805) only says on the subject—"Prussia is committed with the allies, and has adopted a system of conduct decisive of her determination to unite with them against France."—Some of the English politicians appeared to be jealous of the friendship of Prussia; and to think, that like Bavaria, she can blow hot one month, and cold the next. If she does join heartily in the war, we venture to predict, that Bonaparte will not reach Vienna, unless with his hat under his arm, this year.

It is certain the Russian and Prussian troops (the last October, had entered Hanover. At the last dates they had passed through Lauenburg, on the Elbe. The Russians entered Boitzenburg, on the Elbe, the 27th October. It was expected a Prussian army would invade Holland.

An expedition sailed from the Downs the 5th November, destined to co-operate with the allied arms on the continent. It consists of a body of artillery, six British regiments, and the German legion—about 12000 men. Generals Burrard and Moore were to command columns of these troops.

A Gold Watch

FOUND last evening about dusk, near to St. Peter's Church. The owner may have it again, on calling at store 1, Forest-street, on describing the same with its appendages; or should a verbal demand be inconvenient, a note, sufficiently descriptive, will answer the purpose—although an interview with the principal would be more satifactory.

Should the store be shut, the enquiry will be equally effective at 99, Sharp-street, and three doors above the Dutch church.

On Sunday last, departed this life, at his seat near this city, in the 64th year of his age, Mr. CHARLES ROGERS, after a painful lingering illness, which he bore with uncommon patience, fortitude and serenity of mind. His hospitality and philanthropy endeared him to a numerous and respectable acquaintance, who will ever revere his memory. In him were combined the generous friend, the affectionate husband, the tender parent and the indulgent master—He was attended to the grave by a number of mourning friends, from whose fountains of sensibility, involuntarily flowed tributes of regret at his departure from this transitory world.
