APOLLO'S FOUNT.

From the Spirit and Manners of the Age.

THE SPIRIT OF THE SPRING.

Spirit of the shower,
Of the sunshine and the breeze,
Of the long, long twilight hour,
Of the bud and the opening flower,
My soul delighted sees.
Stern winter's robe of grey,
Beneath the balmy sigh,
Like mist-wreaths melts away,
When the rosy laughing day,
Lifts up his golden eye.

Spirit of etherial birth!
Thy azure banner floats,
In lucid folds, o'er air and earth;
While budding woods pour forth their mirth,
In rapture breathing notes.
I see upon the fleecy cloud
The spreading of thy wings;
The hills and vales rejoice aloud,
And nature starting from the shroud
To meet her bridegroom springs.

Spirit of the rainbow zone,
Of the fresh and breezy morn;
Spirit of climes, where joy alone
For ever hovers round thy throne,
On wings of light upborne:
Eternal youth is in thy train,
With rapture-beaming eyes,
And Beauty, with her magic chain,
And Hope, that laughs at present pain,
Points up to cloudless skies.

Spirit of love—of life and light,
Each year we hail thy birth;
The day-star, from the grave of night,
That sets to rise in skies more bright,
To bless the sons of earth.
With leaf, and bud, and blushing flower,
Still deck the barren sod;
In thee we trace a higher power;
In thee we claim a brighter dower,
The day-spring of our God! Z. Z.

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

The facts embraced in the following brief narrative, have been ontained from a gentleman of this city. A part of them came within his own observation, and the others, he derived from the parties with whom they occurred. We assure the reader that we have drawn upon the imagination for no portion of the adventure here related, and we feel convinced that our informant is incapable of practising upon us any deception.

He states that in the year 1825, when returning from Vera Cruz to London, in his Britannic Majesty's ship Phæton, commanded by Captain Sturt of the Royal Navy, they touched at St. Michaels, one of the Azores, a little cluster of islands belonging to the Portugese, situated in the Atlantic Ocean, about equi-distant from from Portugal and Newfoundland. These islands have a fine salubrious atmosphere and abound with a great variety of fruits. Vessels in passing between Europe and America, frequently touch at them for supplies of various kinds.

The object of the Captain, in calling, was to procure some water. Our informant, anxious to examine the town of Punta del Gada, the capital of St Michaels, obtained leave to go on shore for a few hours, the period for which the vessel was likely to be delayed. Among other places, he visited a convent, where he purchased, for the purpose of presenting to his wife and daughters upon his return to London, some beautiful feather flowers, for the manufacture of which the ladies of this convent had long been celebrated. Upon going on board the vessel he found the Captain was likely to be detained longer than was anticipated, and the young officers being pleased with our informant's flowry purchase, became desirous also, of procuring some of these beautiful productions of vestal taste and ingenuity.

Accordingly the next day, the Captain accompanied them, together with our informant and Dr. Mackay, Envoy from the Court of St. James to Mexico, to the convent.—Upon reaching it, they were shown into a room connected with one which the noviciates occupy, many of whom came to the grated windows to look at their visiters, and exchange salutations, which, however, they did principally by gestures, as they could not speak the English language. Dr. Mackay spoke the Portuguese, and occasionally acted as interpreter.

When one of the eldest sisters of the establishment entered the room, bearing in her hand a large basket of feather flowers, the instant she beheld Captain Sturt, she let it fall to the floor, exclaiming with great vehemence, 'Oh! there's the wretch who stole away one of our sisters, and then suffered her to perish for want, in the streets of London' When her indignation had a little abated, the Captain replied, 'Not quite so bad as that my good lady: 'Tis true I stole away one of your nuns, but I can assure you, on the honor of a sailor, she did not perish in the streets of London. She is now my wife, and is living respected and comfortable in that city.' This statement was immediately corroborated by Dr. Mackay and some of the officers but the assurance did not seem to carry either conviction or quietude to the good lady, who could not readily forgive so heinous an offence as the running off with one of her sisters. Upon the young noviciates, however, when informed of the comfortable situation of the lost nun, the effect was very different. They returned to their grated windows, from which they had partly withdrawn upon hearing the exclamation of their elder sister, and in the language of our informant, were not backward in giving the young officer to understand, that they did not think it a very terrible affair 'to be run away with and left to perish in the streets of London.'

After the return of the party on board the Phæton, Captain Sturt gratified their curiosity by a relation of the circumstances of the event which had made so deep an impression upon the feelings of the good sister of the convent. Some twenty years before the time, when a lieutenant in the service, and but eighteen years of age, the vessel to which he was attached—(the name not recollected by our informant)—touched at this same island. The surgeon and captain, then Lieutenant Sturt, visited this convent, both being thoughtless young men and fond of adventures, they contrived to propose to two of the young nuns, an elopement. Having no interpreter, and being unable to speak each other's language, it was no easy matter to settle the preliminary of the affair. It was, however, hastily agreed, that if the officers would return at a certain hour of the night, the young vestals would elope with them and take shelter in the vessel. Full of their romantic enterprise, our two knights were under the walls of the convent at the appointed hour. The nuns were equally punctual. In jumping from the window of the building, the lady who was pledged to Lieutenant Sturt, unfortunately fell and broke her leg. He, therefore, promptly and humanely bequeathed his interest in the wounded girl to the surgeon, and seizing upon the intended partner of his medical friend, hurried with her to the boat—being closely pursued by the watch of the town—and placed her in safety on board the vessel. No sooner was the Captain apprised of this adventure with his lieutenant and surgeon, than prompted by that sense of propriety which constitutes the chivalry of military life, he summoned them into his presence.

'You have now sir,' said he to the lieutenant, 'either to marry this young woman instantly, or she shall be returned to the convent without delay. I will not suffer so great an injury to be inflicted upon her character as would result from her remaining on board the vessel for one single night, unless in the capacity of your wife. I give you half an hour in which to make up your mind.'

After a very brief interview with this trembling black eyed nun, the lieutenant announced to the Captain, his determination to marry her, whereupon the chaplain was summoned to his post, and the marriage ceremony forthwith performed in the presence of the captain and officers to the great gratification of the truant sister, inasmuch as it relieved her from a very unpleasant and embarrassing situation.

Early next morning, the magistrates of Punta del Gada visited the vessel, and demanded by her maiden name the restoration of the lost nun. The captain gave them his word of honour, that he had no female by that name on board his vessel. Surprised and disappointed at this declaration, they returned to the shore, and the captain unfurling his sails, the white walls of the convent were soon lost to the bridal nun.

From the statement of our informant, it appears that this young lady had been placed in the convent by her father, contrary to her wishes and earnest entreaties. Her determination to leave it, was not, therefore, the freak of the moment. She had long before avowed her unalterable resolution of escaping on the first opportunity. She felt, nevertheless, upon reaching London, where she was at once introduced to a highly respectable circle, much uneasiness in regard to the vows which she had taken while in the convent. Her father too who was a resident of St. Michaels, when informed of her elopement and marriage, had his compunctious visitings, in consequence of the disagreeable situation in which his caprice had placed his daughter. He therefore made an urgent appeal to the Pope, and at last succeeded in obtaining his absolution from her vows and a confirmation of her marriage.

When the Phæton reached London, our informant was introduced by captain Sturt, to his wife and daughter, the latter a beautiful and highly accomplished girl of eighteen. They were much amused at the description of the recent scene in the convent of Puta Del Gada, and during the conversation upon the subject, the mother tacitly corroborated the statements of her husband, in regard to her escape from the nunnery and romantic marriage.

THE DEAF AND DUMB.

We witnessed on Wednesday last, at the Capitol, a scene which crested a most lively and profound interest among a large assemblage convened at the unusually early hour of ten o'clock, in the Representatives' Hall. It was the exhibition of two pupils from the Deaf and Dumb Asylum at Philadelphia, under the care of Mr. Weld, the Principal of that institution, who attended in person with these interesting youths. Among the audience we noticed the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and numerous other members of both Houses of Congress, all of whom, together with the strangers and citizens present, appeared sensibly affected by the beautiful display of the youthful deaf mutes. Mr. Weld introduced his pupils to the assembly in a very handsome manner, and with an address so brief, that we could have wished the time before the meeting of the House (11 o'clock) would have allowed him to enlarge on this most important subject. He stated the number of deaf mutes in the United States to be about six thousand. He presented the youths with him, not as having been trained for this particular exhibition, but declared he should ask them such questions as should arise from the suggestion of the moment, without their previous knowledge.

From simple propositions and questions, he went on to those more difficult, and required answers to questions put by gentlemen present. Among the latter handed by different persons of the assembly, were the following: 'Who is the greatest man in the United States?' One of the boys immediately wrote on his slate with incredible rapidity, 'Mr. Webster;' the other 'General Jackson' (Both parties, we presume were satisfied.') 'What ideas have you of the Supreme Being?' Answer. 'He is the great infinite Spirit, the Creator of men, of animals, of all things; He is here and there and every where.' 'Who is Jesus Christ?' 'He is the Son of God, our Saviour.'—'What is ambition?' Ans. 'The feeling of rising up to celebrity or distinction.' 'What is the form of goverment of the United States?' Ans. 'Republican.' Every thought was combined and reduced to words with singular skill and promptness, while every expression of the countenance, and every motion of every part of the body, was 'instinct with eloquence.' No higher tribute could be paid to the signal success and pre-eminent usefulness of this mode of instruction, than was seen in the alternate smiles and tears of the deeply interested auditory.

We trust the House will unite with the Senate, in a substantial expression of their approbation. When the great cause of education is presented to our legislators, we fervently hope it will receive their patronage, whether it be asked for the deaf and dumb, the orphan asylum, especially of our own District, or of the infant school among us. What possible constitutional scruples can there be against such grants, the tendency of which is to elevate the character, and increase the power of the AMERICAN MIND? [Wash. Spectator.

LOVE AND MONEY.

A suit was brought to recover damages in the Court of Common Pleas in this city, somewhat of a novel and peculiar character. It was commenced by Tobias Lower vs. Garret Green, for having intercepted some five or six love letters between him and the dear object of his adoration, Eliza Green, sister of the defendant. It seems that Tobias, the picture of simplicity, and a fair subject for the pencil of a Hogarth, was employed by the defendant on board of a Skipper sailing on the North River, as a common workman, of which defendant was captain. Tobias, from various and considerate reasons, discovered a strong and ardent passion for this lovely idol of his heart's affection, which betook him strongly to contemplate the ecstasies of the married life. Green, the defendant, aware of this, made it the subject of laughter and merriment and practised upon the delusion of poor Tobias in such a manner as gives us reason to doubt its moral propriety and tendency. Green personified his sister, and wrote the love letters alluded to, and sent them to the plaintiff. They were answered in terms of unbounded passion, which afforded infinite merriment to a crowded court. Several witnesses were sworn to prove the allegations laid in the declaration, all of whom, either suspected, or knew it to be a joke. At last, the young lady herself was sworn, and being asked if she knew Tobias, answered that she did, but had scarcely ever spoken to him. The council for the plaintiff submitted with much grace to a nonsuit, and declared to his honour that he should pursue with unfeeling rigour the cruel conspiracy against his client's happiness. [N. Y. Even Jour.

The American phenomenon, Tom Thumb, will be matched by his proprietor against any horse in England, to trot fifty or one hundred miles, in harness, for any sum that may be agreed upon upwards of one hundred pounds. Life in London.

A report at Bordeaux that the vines had been frozen, caused the price of wine to augment.—A similar report was spread at Periguex; but the Echo de Vone states that the mischief is so slight, as scarcely to be worth mentioning.

On the 9th inst., a party went to dine on a sheet of ice at St. Clair, near Lyons. They were seated at table, and near them stood a musician, who enlivened the repast by the exercise of his talents, whilst at another point was seen a cook preparing the dishes at a stove that had been transported to the wintry scene of festivity. On a sudden, the mass of ice on which the company had assembled detached itself, and table, guests, kitchen, cook, and musician, floated down the river.—The Pont Morand was passed in safety, but the ice coming in contact with one of the piers of Pont Charles X. the guests, with their attendants eatables, wine, and culinary utensils, were precipitated into the water. Fortunately, no lives were lost, as the tempters of the deceitful element had taken the precaution of being accompanied by a boat, which picked them up.

On the 11th February, 1597, the Lake of Neufchatel being frozen over, six young men from St. Aubin crossed the ice on foot to Estavayer. They were feasted at the expense of the City Council, and the event recorded in the annals of the town. The phenomenon was renewed on the 6th inst. when eight young men arrived at Estavayer from St. Aubin, who trusted themselves to the ice after it had been frozen only 48 hours. They met with the same reception as their predecessors 135 years ago.

REFORMING A SCOLD.

In the early period of the history of Methodism, some of Mr. Wesley's opponents in the excess of their zeal against enthusiasm, took up a whole waggon load of methodists, and carried them before a justice. When they were asked what these persons had done, there was an awkward silence; at last one of the accusers said, 'Why they pretended to be better than other people; and besides, they prayed from morning to night.' The magistrate asked if they had done any thing else? 'Yes, Sir,' said an old man, 'an't please your worship; they convarted my wife. Till she went among them, she had such a tongue! and now she is as quiet as a lamb.' 'Carry them back, carry them back,' said the magistrate, 'and let them convert all the scolds in the town.'

CAPTAIN COOK'S FATHER.

In a late publication by Colman called Random Records, the following anecdote is related. Near Durham, he mentions, 'there was an individual residing in a neat comfortable cottage who excited much interest. His looks were venerable from his great age; and his deportment was above that which is usually found amongst the inhabitants of a hamlet. His eightieth summer had passed away, and only two or three years previously he had learned to read, that he might gratify a parent's pride and love, by perusing his son's voyage round the world. He was the father of Captain Cook!!!'

The same book relates a story of a Scotchman's tumble from one of the loftiest houses of old Edinburg. 'He slipped, says the Legend, off the roof a habitation sixteen stories high; and when midway in his descent through the air, he arrived at a lodger looking out at the window of the eighth floor, to whom (as he was an acquaintance) he observed, 'eh, Sanday, man, sic o fa' I shall hae!' [Sat. Bull.

Sam Patch outdone—by an Ox.—We have been lately informed, by a respectable farmer of this town, of a wonderful leap taken by an ox belonging to a neighbour of his, a short time since, to the truth of which many intelligent witnesses are ready to vouch. It appears that the animal was feeding on the edge of a precipice, about sixty feet in height, when, either by a contest with another, or a faux pas, he was thrown from the summit, and landed at the bottom, amid a promiscuous pile of rocks, with but little injury. Soon after this 'flight sublime,' his oxship was discovered quietly feeding below, apparently well satisfied with one attempt at æronatic excursion; and, probably had he lived in the days of Æsop, he could say to all inquiries, as Pat did on a similar occasion, —'its's easy enough flying sure, och! and its hard lightning.' The ox, we understand, was under the yoke, soon after its leap, and performs, as ever, to the satisfaction of his owner. [Stonington Telegraph.

CURIOSITY.—A solid block of white marble, of thirty cubic feet, was lately taken out of Henderson's quarry, at the depth of seventy feet, four or five miles from Norristown, on the western side of the Schuylkill. It was sent to Norristown, to be cut by the saw into slabs. On one of its sides are two characters, somewhat resembling the English word in, regularly cut into the marble. This singular appearance must either have been a freak of nature, or the work of man executed ages ago, and the marble must have been growing over it ever since; for it was found by the sawyer in the very interior of the block. The curious slab is now in possession of Colonel Peter A. Browne, of this city, who will, we are sure, take pleasure in showing it to any gentleman who may be inquisitive on geological subjects. DEATH BY POISON.

Died in this borough on the 28th ult. Jeremiah Snyder, in the 14th year of his age.—The deceased was a promising youth and an only son of John Snyder, a highly respectable mechanic of this place. The deceased is said to have died in consequence of eating apple-butter that had been put in earthen crocks, which had imbibed the glazing which was made of Red Lead. Mr. Snyder, his wife and three others of the family ate of the butter and were sick, but there are very favourable hopes entertained of their recovery. Persons should be cautious how they use earthenware that is glazed with this pernicious poison.
