Our EXTRAORDINARY Minister—It is even as we expected with Mr. Randolph—nay worse. The article lately published of him doesnt reveal half the truth. Every American in St. Petersburg has been made to blush for his country. The American minister was grossly intoxicated day after day. When the foreign ministers at the Russian capital called at his lodgings and sent their cards up to him, he tore them to pieces in a rage before their servants declaring he would have no such formalities—that when he wished to see them he would let them know. He refused to receive a note from Prince Leven, the principal minister of state, and sent the messenger back with it. Upon this the Americans there interposed, & by representing to the clownish minister that it would be a direct insult to the Emperor he was induced to send after and recall the carrier. The Americans there boarding at the same house finally resolved to send a representation of his conduct to our government; but this became unnecessary as Mr. Randolph suddenly demanded his passports and took his departure home, via the south of Europe. Here then is a beautiful expenditure of eighteen thousand dollars of the people's money by way of reform. We hope Mr. Secretary Van Buren will not fail to go down to Norfolk on his return and welcome him home! N.Y. Commercial

New York—Full returns of the New York election which took place on the 2d inst. have not been received. No doubt is entertained of Throop's election as governor, and a majority of the members of congress, elect, being in favor of the administration.

Mr. John Quincy Adams has been elected to congress, from Plymouth disct.

WEIRICH—We referred lately to the case of Fuller the bank robber at Boston, as one of a striking nature; yet from a notice of which a salutary moral lesson might be gleaned. We now advert to one of a still more melancholy character in the case of Weirich the mail robber, who has recently been tried at Pittsburg, and sentenced to the penitentiary for 20 years. The circumstances of the case were these:

'Mr. Wilson, merchant of Wheeling, mailed a letter containing $1000 to Mr M'Shane of Pittsburg. The letter was received but contained instead of bank notes a few scraps of paper. An investigation of the circumstances was immediately commenced by Wm. Eichbaum, postmaster at Pittsburg. One of the scraps was endorsed Washington, Pa. It was supposed, as possible, that this scrap indicated the Washington post office where the robbery was mailed. On examination this supposition was entirely without foundation. Mr. Morgan the post master at that place accompanied mr. Eichbaum to Wheeling and after searching the Wheeling post office and having discovered the hand writing of Weirich on one of the scraps of paper substituted in the letter for bank notes, they accidentally encountered him—he was arrested and the identical money mailed in the letter was found on him. The envelope round the money corresponded with a scrap enclosed in the letter when received in Pittsburg. The scrap with the words Washington, Pa. it was said was probably mailed from Washington the original place of destination, to Claysville, and that Weirich through that insinuation common to criminals meant it to implicate the postmaster at Washington as the perpetrator of the robbery. Mr. Wilson's clerk, since dead, previous to mailing the letter took a memorandum on paper in presence of a brother of the dates, numbers, denominations, the value, &c. of the bank notes. The brother was produced as a witness and identified the notes by the memorandum.'

On this evidence the wretched man was convicted of the crime alleged against him and was adjudged the sentence we have noted. Weirich is said to be worth a moderate fortune; 20.000 dolls; to have been engaged in a profitable business and to have enjoyed a reputable name. Nothing then could have urged him to the commission of crime but an iniquitous thirst for the accumulation of mammon; a love of gain which he held paramount to honesty in this world and retribution in the next. He was old and grey headed and it is more than probable his mortal span will have ceased ere he escapes from the dreary confines of the penitentiary.

We ask the attention of our readers to the ease; of every man who in the pursuit of business and acquisition of wealth may be tempted to the transgression of the laws and to the incurring of the penalty which may be painful under the circumstances. Guilt in any description can seldom be concealed; and if it escape the responsibilities of the law it does not those of fate or the conscience. Never was a truer saying than that honesty is the best policy. Its practice nerves us with a moral vigour, an unshrinking independence, that despite the rebuffs of the world, 'the stings and arrows of outrageous fortune,' will carry us through the narrow passes of life and will give us an undaunted and inward satisfaction with ourselves that is beyond all the mockery of show, which wealth, acquired by fraud and duplicity enables its votaries to put on.

With the young and aspiring who are just entering the threshhold of life, no principle should be rooted with more firmness in their bosoms than that of honesty—moral, political, and business honesty. In some cases its practice may not be immediately profitable in a pecuniary point of view, but it will be so in the end; and let them refer to the case of Weirich, and others, who have pursued the same path as illustrative of what may be the result of an opposite course.

Massachusetts—Nathan Appleton is elected to congress from Boston—Appleton 3341; Lee 2437. Mr. Everett is reelected from Middlesex by a large majority. In Norfolk district, now represented by John Baily, Gen. Dearborn is elected.

Recipe to preserve reputation.—In principle be enlightened and firm; in manners courteous and discreet; in speech circumspect and mild; in action energetic and uncompromising; in heart benevolent and amiable. Be a Christian, not in name only, but in reality, acting where unknown the same as where known; and maintaining a transparency of character; read and known of all men. The tongue of slander may assail such a one, but it will cleave to the roof of the slanderer's mouth and the vituperated will go free.

True politeness.—Louis XIV, in a gay party at Versailles, thought he perceived an opportunity of relating a facetious story. He commenced, but ended the tale abruptly and insipidly. One of the company soon afterwards leaving the room, the King said, 'I am sure you must all have observed how very uninteresting my anecdote was. I did not recollect till I began, that the turn of the narrative reflected very severely on the immediate ancestor of the prince of Armigac, who has just quitted us, and on this, as on every occasion, I think it far better to spoil a good story, than distress a worthy man.'

Humane driver rewarded.—A poor Macedonian soldier was one day leading before Alexander, a mule laden with gold for the King's use; the beast being so tired that he was not able either to go or sustain the load, the mule driver took it off, and carried it himself with great difficulty a considerable way. Alexander seeing him just sinking under the burden, and about to throw it on the ground, cried out,—'Friend, do not be weary yet; try and carry it quite through to thy tent, for it is all thy own.'

A gay spark who had taken up his lodging at a tavern and made a good bill, changed his quarters without paying. The enraged landlord told his wife to go and dun him, which the spark hearing, said he'd publicly kiss her. Will he, quoth the lady, will he? Give me my bonnet Molly, I'll see if any fellow on earth has such impudence—my dear, said the cooling husband, pray dont be so rash; you dont know what a man may do while in a passion.

SCENE AT A KENTUCKY ELECTION.

A number of runners, each with a whiskey bottle poking its long, jolly neck from his pocket, were busily employed in bribing voters, and each party kept half a dozen bullies under pay—genuine specimens of Kentucky Alligatorism—to flog every poor fellow who should attempt to vote illegally. A half hundred of morter would scarce fill up the chinks of the skulls that were broken on that occasion. I barely escaped myself. One of the runners came up to me, and slapping my shoulder with his right hand, and a whiskey bottle with his left, asked me if I was a voter. No, said I. Ah; never mind, quoth the fellow, pulling a corn cob from the nose of his bottle; and shaking it up to the best advantage, just take a swig at the cretur, and toss in a vote for old Hickory's boys—I'll fight for you, damme! Here was a temptation, to be sure, but after looking attentively at the bottle and the bullies, who were standing ready with their sledge hammer fists to knock down all interlopers, my fears prevailed and I lost my whiskey. Shortly after this, I witnessed a fight that would have done honor to Mendoza and Big Ben. A great, ruffian-looking scoundrel, with his arms like a pair of cables knotted at the ends, and a round black head that looked like a forty four pound cannon shot, swaggered up to the polls, and threw in his bit of paper, and was walking on in triumph. Stop, friend! exclaimed one of the Salt River Roarers, stepping deliberately up to him, are you a voter? Yes, by——, replied he of the bullet-head. That's a——lie? rejoined the Roarer, and you may just prepare yourself to go home an old man, for I'll be——if I dont knock you into the middle of your ninety-ninth year! Aye—aye, said the other, come on then—I'll ride you to hell; whipped up with the sea-serpent! They had now reached an open space, and the salt River bully, shaking his fists a moment by way of a feint, dropped his chin suddenly on his bosom, and pitched head foremost towards the stomach of his antagonist, with the whole strength of his gigantic frame. Bullet head, however, was on his guard, and dodging aside with the quickness of lightning, to avoid the shock, gave the assailant a blow that sent him staggering against a whiskey table, where he fell to the ground amidst the crash of bottles, mugs and tumblers. Nothing daunted by this temporary discomfiture, the bully gathered himself up, and, with a single muttered curse, resumed his stand in front of his foe. Several blows were now given on both sides with tremendous effect, and, in a few moments, the Salt River boy, watching his opportunity, repeated the manoeuvre, in which he had first been foiled.—This time he was successful. His head was planted directly in his antagonist's stomach, who fell back with such force, that I had no expectation of his ever rising again. Is the scoundrel done for! inquired the temporary victor, walking up and looking down upon his prostrate foe. Bullet Head spoke not, but, with the bound of a wild cat, leaped to his feet, and grappled with his enemy. It was a trial of strength, and the combatants tugged and strained, and foamed at the mouth, and twined like serpents around each others' bodies till at length the strength of Bullet Head prevailed, and his opponent lay struggling beneath him. Gouge him! gouge him! exclaimed a dozen voices, and the topmost combatant seized his victim by the hair, and was preparing to follow the advice that was thus shouted in his ears, when the prostrate man, roused by desperation, and exerting strength that seemed super human, caught his assailant by the throat with a grasp like that of fate. For a few moments the struggle seemed to cease, and then the face of the throttled man turned black, his tongue fell out of his mouth, and he rolled on the ground as senseless as a dead man. I turned away, a confirmed believer in the doctrine of total depravity.
