supposed it possible to carry them into effect & operation. — Recognizing Mr. Leackle as the real author of these bills, or rather of this Charter, he was appealed to by the writer hereof and told that the provisions of this Charter were too monstrous for endurance, & that they ought to be repealed. But he then assumed high ground, and said they could not be repealed, that it was not in the power of the legislature to effect a repeal; rights having already vested under it! — The use that he intended to make of this Charter, with its ample Banking privileges, may be inferred from the manner in which he has sought to seize upon & use the Charter of the present company, and it will be borne in mind that Banking privilege was in high request at this Session, & could have been sold in the last resort, with the power to use it any where in the State, for a very large consideration. Finding Mr. Leackle's confident position, it was deemed advisable to test the temper of the ~~legislature~~ House of Delegates by the message from the Senate adopted on the day of & to be found on the Senate journal page of the Session of 1835. — This message analyzed Mr. Leackles charter, so artfully contrived in the three laws & pointed out among other things the monstrous provisions of allowing the corporators to seize upon all the lands
