between the two Nations, after the restoration of peace. They persuaded however with the deepest regret that a spirit alike just and humane, was neither cherished nor acted on by your Government: such an alternative would not be hazarded, if it was not supported by facts, the proof of which has perhaps already carried the same conviction to other Nations that it has to the people of these States. Without dwelling on the deplorable cruelties committed by the Savages in the British Lands and in British Bay, on American prisoners at the River Raisin, which
