SATURDAY MORNING.....Nov. 17, 1883.

THE COLONEL'S SNEEZE.

That Saved Two Regiments of Soldiers in the Late War.

Yesterday, while engaged in conversation with Major ——, in front of the post-office, a Tribune reporter noticed a man of fine physique and handsome, intelligent features, walking leisurely along on the opposite side of the street, when all at once there passed over his face the painful and puzzled expression of idiotic helplessness. He reeled to the outer edge of the pavement like a man with an apoplectic fit, and bracing himself leaned over the curbing with all the desperation of a sea-sick woman. He stood half bent as if an Iowa cyclone or Krakatoan earthquake was playing sad havoc with his interior organization. Suddenly the disturbance came to a head in his nose in the shape of a prolonged and chopped up sneeze which startled everybody within three squares.

"Ash-oo—Whoope-hoo!" rang out again and again as the stalwart stranger's heels would fly up and the tails of his Prince Albert would fly over his head. The very ground that he stood on trembled, and the crowd of loafers on the post-office steps beat a retreat, fearing that the building might tumble down.

After the storm the sneezer straightened himself up, and took soundings. About this time the major left us, crossing the street, embraced the stranger, and, with tears in his eyes, sobbed, "How do you do, colonel?"

They shook each other's hands and shoulders, and made us understand that they hadn't seen each other for twenty years. The colonel had changed very much, and he asked in bewilderment how the major knew him.

"Knew you! By your sneeze, colonel. There is no other sneeze like yours in the country, you know. When I heard it I thought of the time at Fishing Creek."

Turning to us the major said: "That was about our first scouting expedition, and all of our men were green. It was on the eve of the battle of Fishing Creek, the second battle of the rebellion in Virginia, and our two regiments had been ordered to search the country for straggling federal sharpshooters and skirmishers. It was night, and neither regiment was acquainted with the topography of the country. Moving forward in line, the night black as the chamber of darkness in Dante's 'Inferno,' our regiment suddenly came upon a body of troops ready to receive them, with skirmishers out. Neither men nor officers were clear as to what the regulations called for in such a case, and there was a hurried and excited conference. The troops might be our own men, but they ignored every challenge, and we knew that they, like ourselves, were ready to fire.

It was a moment of terrible suspense. Everybody excited—everybody in doubt. Then suddenly there rang out along the ghostly line in the distance the major's double barreled sneeze. It was a joyful sound, and in our relief both regiments fairly danced as roar after roar of laughter followed each succeeding sneeze. It was a narrow escape from a mistake too common then of one confederate regiment pouring a murderous fire into another. The major's sneeze, saved us then, and don't you forget it."

THE LEAVES OF A TREE.

In a recent lecture Prof. Beal talked about leaves. Among other good things he said:

As is well known, a tree cannot grow without leaves. These are put forth every year and are a contrivance for vastly increasing the surface.—An oak tree of good size exposes several acres of surface to the air during the growing season. It has been estimated that the Washington elm at Cambridge, Mass., not a very large tree, exposes about five acres of foliage, if we include both sides of the leaves. Lee res are more nearly comparable to stomachs than to lungs. A leaf is a laboratory for assimilating or manufacturing raw materials into plant fabric. The cellular structure of the leaves, wood and bark of a tree is a complicated subject to treat in a popular way. It requires a vast surface of leaves to do a little work. By counting the leaves on a seedling oak and estimating the surface on both sides of each, we can see how many inches are needed to build up the roots and stems for the first year. After the first year the old stem of the oak bears no leaves. It is dependent on the leaves of the branches, or its children for support. A tree is a sort of community, each part having its own duties to perform. The root hairs take up most of the nourishment. The young roots take this to the larger ones, and they in turn, like the branches of a river, pour the flood of crude sap into the trunk, which conveys it to the leaves. The assimilated or digested sap passes from the leaves to all growing parts of the plant, and a deposit is made where most needed. If a branch is much exposed to the winds, the base of it has a certain support or certain amount of nourishment. So with the trunk of a tree. If the base of a branch of the main trunk is much exposed to the winds and storms, a much thicker deposit of food is made there. The winds give a tree exercise, which seems good to help make it strong. Our toughest wood comes from trees growing in exposed places. The limbs of a tree are all the time striving with each other to see which shall have the most room and the most sunshine.—While some perish in the attempt, or meet with only very indifferent success, the strongest of the strong buds survive.

POINTS IN NATURAL HISTORY.

There is a bird in Africa known as the agami, that possesses many characteristics of the shepherd dog. It will guard flocks of ducks or other fowl, driving them to their feeding places, keep off hawks and destructive animals, bring them home and drive them into their pens. They have been taught to herd sheep and are said to be superior to the dog. Those owned by English sportsmen join in the chase, keeping abreast of the hounds, at the same time indulging in curious aerial gymnastics, such as turning flipflaps, falling as if shot, and indulging in fierce combats with imaginary foes.

The elephant, as well as all of the thick-skinned animals, is beset and tormented with ticks and other vermin burrowing into the hide, causing intense itching and pain. So intense does this become sometimes that the animal is rendered insane and goes cavorting and bellowing through the forests, and woe betide the man or beast found in its path. Its roars even bring to it flocks of white herons, which go deliberately to work and pick out the vermin, sometimes boring entirely through the skin in order to reach them. The elephant appreciates the services of the bird very highly, and will, under no circumstances, injure it. Where there are no elephants these birds perform a similar service for cattle and other animals infested with grubs, ticks or other parasites. Then there is a smaller bird that picks the bugs off the heron, then a larger one that eats the little bird.—St. MutAattan Stanley.

How She Managed Her Husband.

I've learned the secret art so well,
The slightest hint will easy tell
What plans to make and how I may
Delight and please from day to day.
When he returns fatigued at night,
He finds all cheerful, sweet and bright,
His slippers by the easy chair,
His dressing gown, too, hanging there;
Our little table neatly laid
With tempting dishes I have made.

And my reward for all of this—
He greets me with a loving kiss.
I feel that I am amply paid,
And hope these joys will never fade.
In these few lines I now have told
What's worth to me a mine of gold:
The secret's out, and try you may,
You'll find it is the only way.
