ANOTHER YEAR.

"Let the dead be buried,"

Fresher shall the living grow."

The old year is not here today.

It is with the long ago.

Slightly it passed away.

Never shall it ebb or flow.

Now a new year has begun.

All its gates are opened wide.

Pleading through the morning sun,

Clear is flowing down its tide.

Over head a star is seen.

And a rainbow lights the sky;

Emerald gems in pastures green.

Meet the hope illumined eye.

Buds are opening on the mead.

Smiling Spring awakes the flowers.

And the winter slumbering snows

Burst to life: fresh genial showers.

Velvety the fields appear.

Wealth is sleeping in each grain.

Golden harvest floating near.

Laden showers without a stain.

Grapes upon the hill side grow.

Songs enliven all the way.

Sweetest strains from peasant throats.

Sparkling more from every day.

Thus we are hope led on.

To the winter ocean's end.

This new year too is gone.

And the snow drifts on the plain.

Wilmington, Jan. 5, 1884. MATTHEW CANBY.

LADY ALEN.

The Kind of a Husband Girls

Can do Without.

Above all things shun the society

of the lazy man: for he is fit for nothing except to sleep, eat, bawl out castles and

dream of untold wealth, he is momentarily expecting showered upon him. He is a pest

in society—a disgrace to the human race and a bore in general. You may say his character, sugar his bones, but you never stick pins in his coat tail, put your nose

in his bed, throw cold water in his face

before he is up in the morning, subject

him to every earthly abuse in your power

but for Heaven's sake, and your own never marry him! No matter how handsome he is—no matter how agreeable

—no matter how polite, agreeable or conceding—no matter how much he says he loves you, don't you marry him,

unless you wish to become a menial

drudge, black his boots, cook his dinner,

wash his shirts, mend his clothes, nurse

the children, clean the house, alternately

and simultaneously, whilst your husband is shut up in the parlor, enjoying his noon nap, or strolling in work on agriculture (which he is very careful never to experiment from), without a thought or care for what may be doing.

And now, girls, as these things in the form of men are very common I am going to draw a sketch from real life as a warning to you, to take my advice, and never throw yourself away by marrying one of these scamps, which infest every place

and all society, more or less, at the present day.

Nellie Crawford was my most intimate friend, and I loved her as a sister. Her school were inseparable, both within doors and without. Brought in early life of her parents, and alone in the world,

without father, mother, brother or sister

to love, her affection seemed to center on me (her charm and character), and most warmly did I reciprocate her sentiments.

She was pretty—almost beautiful. Her sparking more from every day.

Thus we are hope led on.

To the winter ocean's end.

This new year too is gone.

And the snow drifts on the plain.
