SATURDAY MORNING..... JULY 5, 1884.

Playing School.

Two little tots on the carpet at play,
Tired of their usual games one day,
Said one to the other: "Let's play tool;
I'll be the teacher, and don't you fool,
But sit up nice, like a sure 'nough stolar;
You'll miss your lesson, I'll bet a lace collar."

Casting about for a word to spell,
Blue eyes on pens and her kitten fell;
As an object lesson they pose with grace,
The mamma washing her baby's face.
"Spell tat," the teacher grandly gives out;
"Quick, now, mind what you're about."

The "scolar" failing, with ignominy,
Is sorely shaken and dubbed a ninny,
The word repeated, again she fails,
When the scene on the rug again avails,
And the teacher relents, conscience smitten—
"If you tan't spell tat, why just spell titten."

How a Congressman Fooled a Literary Society.

"Ben Hardin was a brilliant fellow, and he had a strong sense of humor," says a Washington letter to the Cleveland Leader. When he was elected to Congress in 1815 he had already served several terms in the Kentucky Legislature and was noted throughout the State as a lawyer. He started, however, for Washington, dressed in the rough clothing of a frontier State, and he wore the slouch hat and the long buff overcoat of the West. As he was passing through Virginia two smart, young looking fellows overtook and fell into conversation with him. Hardin saw at their first words that they took him for a greenhorn, and he put on such manners and accent as to confirm their illusion. The meeting took place within a few miles of the town where they were to stop for the night. In the course of the conversation the young bloods told him there was to be a literary society meeting that night, and that if he would attend he might hear some fine speaking, and at this point one of them, slyly winking to the other, said, "And perhaps, stranger, you may join in the debate yourself?"

"I don't know," replied Hardin. "I have spoken some in old Kentucky. What mought your question be?"

The question was not new to him. It was one of the leading ones of the day—a political issue upon which he was thoroughly posted. As old Ben Hardin heard it, however, he shook his head and said: "Boys, you will hev to excuse me on thet. I ain't up on thet subject. Now, if it was whether pursuit was better than possession, or some of our old subjects, I allow I'd tackle ye. But about this politics I don't know."

After much persuasion, however, he promised the young men that he would attend and he "would say suthin' anyhow." The party separated at the hotel, and the young fellows went off laughing at the fun they expected to have that night. They told their friends, and in a short time the whole town knew of the green Kentuckian's arrival, and when the literary society opened every seat was filled. The exercises went off quietly until the debate commenced when every one looked at Hardin. He sat quietly until the close. The two young fellows made their speeches, and very fair ones, too. As the second one closed and Mr. Hardin arose, each one in the audience nudged his neighbor, and every face was ready to smile. Their expressions changed, however, as old Ben took up the subject and treated it most eloquently. He tore to pieces the speeches of the young fellows who had tried to play the tricks on him, and as he was finishing the two were so bored that they got up and left. He referred to them as they went, and closed after an eloquent peroration by telling the society that he was a Kentucky member of Congress on his way to Washington. At this the society gathered round him and wanted to shake his hand. He chatted with them for a while, and the remainder of his visit was an ovation. The whole town came out to the hotel the next day to see him off, and the smart young fellows was the laughing stock of all.

GUIDE TO HORSEMANSHIP.

The following is the introduction to Rev. S. T. Gardner's little book on "The Horseman's Pocket Book:"

1. You must master yourself, if you would become the master of your horse. Do not get into a passion. This will frighten the animal, and make your task more difficult.

2. Speak in a low tone of voice. Disregarding this rule, will have the same retarding effect as disregarding the former. You will find, all things else being equal, that those teamsters and drivers who speak barely loud enough to be heard, have the best command of their teams.

3. Have courage to undertake the breaking of your own horse, for it is not likely you will find in another, all the virtues necessary to the task. To gain knowledge is to gain confidence; so when you shall have made the directions of this little book yours, you will hardly be doubtful of success.

4. Persevere in your efforts until you succeed. Possibly the horse may hold out longer than you at first supposed, though it is likely he will submit sooner than you anticipated; but go in to conquer, and make no calculation as to the time he may hold out, and you are sure of success. There may be no apparent improvement up to the moment of complete submission.

5. Remember always not to trust your horse too far. One submission is not a cure. You must not trust him until you know his evil habit is broken and destroyed. It may show your skill to trust your horse very soon and very far, but it does not exhibit your prudence.

6. Be kind to the animal in all your efforts. Nowhere is kindness more appreciated and beneficial than by the instinctive horse. He delights to obey a kind master. We seldom use a whip, and it may be our own fault that a single recommendation is given in these pages for its sharp application, but even then it is recommended for but a short time.

7. Do not presume that you can break up a bad habit in a horse, or even think you can properly break a colt, until you have read carefully this entire book and are prepared to apply its instructions. Make it therefore a book of study, and carry it in your pocket when there is a possibility for its need.

Selling One Another as Slaves.

A Madagascar letter in the Springfield Republican says: When we were passing through Fiherings, a town on the Fiherenana river, a party of thirty men belonging to a Bara tribe came down from the interior with cattle to trade with the people of Fiherings. The cattle were disposed of without difficulty, and the Baras were told that it was a pity that they had not brought any slaves down with them, as the people of Fiherings were sadly in need of more slaves. It was also hinted that very high prices would have been paid. Some of the Baras, hearing this, immediately put their heads together, and a conspiracy was formed among twenty of their number. These twenty, watching their opportunity, overpowered the other ten, and, after robbing them, sold them for slaves. This business worked so well that another conspiracy was soon organized among twelve to sell the other eight. In this the majority also succeeded. These twelve then started for their native village, but, I understand, reduced their number to six before they had proceeded very far. The above is only one of many strange proceedings which is continually taking place in this land of robbers and murderers. Beside treacherously selling each other for slaves, it is quite common for men to sell their own children, and I have upon several occasions had parents offer me one or more of their children as slaves.

THE ADMINISTRATION NOT JEALOUS.—It appears that the President and the members of his cabinet are not supporting Mr. Blaine's candidacy with the alacrity that was expected. With the exception of the rather matter-of-course telegram sent to Mr. Blaine by the President immediately after the nomination, no assurances of support have been received by Mr. Blaine or his friends from any member of the administration. Not only is hot zeal wanting, but a rather frigid indifference is manifested. This was instanced, it is said, in the fact that not a single member of the cabinet was present at the recent Blaine and Logan ratification meeting in Washington, and no notice was taken of the invitations to be present. The Washington Star having interviewed a member of the cabinet, an explanation of the non-attendance was received, but it was not such as to mend matters. Members of the cabinet were invited to attend and speak, but an intimation having been received afterward that Mr. Blaine did not wish them to speak, they declined to attend. The member of the cabinet who was interviewed expressed himself as follows: "If there is any member of the cabinet opposed to the candidates, and does not intend to support them in the coming canvass, I have yet to hear of such a one." That is putting it coolly, to say the least. It is not the question of "opposing" but of supporting the ticket that Mr. Blaine would naturally expect the cabinet to be meditating.—Balt. Sun.

If the old adage that a "profusion of locust blossoms is a forerunner of a huge corn crop" be correct, then we may look for plenty of corn the present season, as the locust trees were laden with blossoms.

Do not let adversity discourage you, my son. Were it not for the kicks which it receives the foot-ball would never get up in the world.—Boston Transcript.
