A TERRIBLE RIDE.

Many years ago I was instructed to discover the whereabouts of a young lady who was "wanted"—why, it is unnecessary for me to tell but it was in the execution of my duty that I discovered her. I had tracked her fugitive to Brighton, where I made the discovery that she was just upon the point of returning to London. This suited me admirably; as I could deliver the disagreeable business of arrest till we arrived at the end of the journey; but, in order to be upon the safe side, I, of course, did not lose sight of her, and finally seated myself in the same compartment of the train as she herself occupied.

It was the morning express, and our compartment contained but three passengers, a gentleman, a lady—the object of my quest, and a young man. The gentleman, who was a member of the most respectable family in the land, and who had been a member of the House of Commons, was seated next to me. The lady, who was a widow, and who had been a member of the same body, was seated next to the gentleman. The young man, who was a member of the same body, was seated next to me.

As I was seated next to the gentleman, I was enabled to observe him from the moment that he entered the train. He was a man of about 40 years of age, and of a very agreeable countenance. He was dressed in a very respectable manner, and he carried with him a very large portfolio. He was seated next to me, and he was very kind and courteous to me. He was very much interested in the story of my quest, and he was very kind and courteous to me.

As the train moved on, I was enabled to observe the lady. She was a woman of about 30 years of age, and of a very agreeable countenance. She was dressed in a very respectable manner, and she carried with her a very large portfolio. She was seated next
