THE GOVERNOR.

"Angeline!" cried Mrs. Duncan, as she flashed into her daughter's bedroom, "what shall I do? I have just received a regret from Madam Bontelle, and I don't know what in the world I am to do with the count."

"You're sure he is coming?" queried Angeline, anxiously.

"Oh, yes. He's all right--the dear fellow! I had the sweetest note from him, saying that he would be charmed. But now that Madam Bontelle isn't coming, there'll be no one who can talk to him.
Angeline I wish you would give a little more attention to your French."

"I have just been taking a lesson, mamma," Angeline replied. "Mademoiselle La Fontaine taught me a new verb this afternoon."

Mrs. Duncan glanced at the little French governess, hitherto unnoticed, and said, patently:

"I hope you will take great pains with her pronunciation. I always said that French did not amount to much without a pronunciation."

"There's no language which does," replied the little governess, quietly.

"Of course not," Angeline, are you most through with your lessons? Those ladies have come from McKay's, and I do want to go to you about this dinner. Yes, you must not forget that you are to translate my bill of fare into French--will you?"

"No, madam, I will not forget."

She quitted the room with a bow and bearing that showed she had not always been a mere teacher of French to young children and giddy girls. Indeed, there had been a time when the old La Fontaine family had stood to all Providence as a type of the French nation. But the Franco-Prussian war had made a beggar of the once rich family, and left Valerie with a widowed mother, who soon died of grief.

"Mamma," said the fair Angeline, as she watched the slender, gray-robed figure of sight, "why don't you get mademoiselle in the place of the Bontelle woman?"

"What?" screamed Mrs. Duncan. "Give the place next to Count de Beaupre to a governess?"

"You wouldn't tell anybody who she is,
would you?"

"Knows how to behave?" It was well for the fair Angeline, who planned that mademoiselle did not hear her.

"I shall sit on one side of the count," said Angeline airily. "Of course he will talk to me a great deal, and if I get stuck, mademoiselle can help me out. On the whole, mamma, I think that that is a very good family had stood to all Providence as a type of the French nation. But the Franco-Prussian war had made a beggar
of the once rich family, and left Valerie with a widowed mother, who soon died of
grief."

"I don't care," cried Angeline, bursting into tears. "She kept Count de Beaupre away from me all the evening."

"Miss Duncan," said the little governess with much dignity, "I assure you that I had no such intention."

"That will do, mademoiselle!" said Mrs.
Duncan, coldly. "You can go now."

So the poor girl hurried out of the room and met the Count de Beaupre, waiting, but in hand, in the hall. She saw by his face that he had heard all.

"I thought you had gone," she stammered.

"I waited for you," he answered in his native tongue. "I thought you had no escort.
May I have the honor of seeing you home, mademoiselle?"

"I have no carriage," faltered poor Valerie.

"Mine is at the door."

So the little governess found herself rolling home in state.

"I thought not to let you do this," she said hurriedly. "I am not one of Mrs.
Duncan's guests, monsieur; I am only her governess."

"The name of La Fontaine is very dear to me," said the count gently. "My father's best friend was a French general, who was killed at Sedan, and that was his name.
A brave fellow he was, too."

"It was my father?" cried Valerie. "My father was General Gervaise La Fontaine."

"Yes," continued Mr. Kellogg, "where the seat of Hamilton College, the alma mater of Senator Payne, General Hawley, Rev. Dr.
Bartlett, Judge Schofield, and many other where Washington knows and appreciates, and where the education and religion permanent of his education. It was also the seat of several seminaries for girls and an academy for boys. The college and a portion of the preparatory schools were under the charge of the denomination to which Rev. Mr. Cleveland was attached. The air of education and religion permeated the little village. Many families had like that of Mr. Cleveland, made Clinton a home on account of its educational advantages, and the spirit of foreign missionaries was so strong that many of the young ladies who grew up there became missionaries.
The long evenings slipped by quickly. The count took her to the opera, and they had many pleasant jaunts together."

"I will do my part," said Valerie, warmly.
And the count, having taken her hand in his, found occasion to hold it awhile.

Valerie was most happy now that she had found a friend among her countrymen.
