ABOUT COW PEAS.

Written For The KENT NEWS by a Practical, Up-to-date Farmer.

The late or what would be more properly termed the principal seeding of Cow Peas begins with us about the middle of June and extends to the middle of July. We have discontinued planting the first of June because this brings the harvesting for hay in August which is usually a very wet month and we find it very much more profitable to have them mature in September.

In these late plantings we aim to get the seed in at a depth of not less than two inches, so as to protect the seed from the intense heat and dry surface soil. In preparing the soil for cow-peas do it as rapidly as possible and immediately plant for if the soil is left until it becomes firmed it means great loss in the crop. The cow-peas must have well loosened soil to start in and if given a seed bed of this kind it will be up in four days. After this the packing of the soil by rain does not seem to effect their growth and they soon shade the ground so that the soil beneath remains moist and soft.

The growers of early potatoes are planting the cow-peas after they harvest the potatoe crop, then take off the hay and plant some to wheat and some to scarlet clover. Asparagus growers are also using them to keep up the fertility of their beds.

In July when we turn our stock in our wheat stubble we plow our pasture field that is to go in corn next year, then seed it down to cow-peas and in September we turn everything in the stock line on them to pasture. The result is the stock all come out fat and the corn crop increased to such an extent that I am fearful if I give you the exact figures on my farm you would still more doubt the advisability of giving the cow-pea a trial. Don't understand me as referring to light or medium soils alone, as I include all kinds from the lightest to the heaviest soils.

In one field this season we will add one peck of early amber sorgum seed per acre for hay purposes. The department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. recommends this addition very highly: after cutting the crop we do not disturb it until cured and ready to stack then the rakes are put to work in the morning before the dew is off and run until the vines rattle and begin to drop leaves, the rakes are then stopped and the hay thrown up in small cocks of one good fork full. This raking and cocking we finish by noon then haul off the balance of the day. This is repeated until all of the crop is stacked, the seed crop is hauled in the same way except that less time is required to cure as the vines are not cut until most of the leaves have dropped off, and while there may be some sap in the vines the pods you will find are hard and the pea the same, they could be threshed out for seed at this time if it were not for the unmatured peas, they being soft causes the pea to heat and mold so I would advise that they be stacked for at least thirty days before attempting to thresh them out.
